INTRODUCTORY OBSERVATIONS.

LONDON, in former ages, has frequently suffered from the ravages of Pestilence, and thousands and tens of thousands of the inhabitants have been swept by its virulence into one common grave. But at no period of our annals was the mortality so devastating as in the year 1665. It was then, indeed, that man "withered like the grass," and that his brief earthly existence became a "fleeting shadow." Contagion was rife in all our streets, and so baleful were its effects, that the church-yards were not sufficiently capacious to receive the dead. It seemed for a while as though the brand of the avenging angel had been unloosed in judgment, and that the infected city was doomed to become another Golgotha!

The "Journal of the Plague Year," attributed to De Foe, was originally published in the year 1772; and the question as to its genuineness and accuracy, as an account of that calamity, has given rise to much discussion. Like most of De Foe's works, it appeared without an author's name, but no one who is at all acquainted with the general characteristics of his writings, "can, for a moment, hesitate to agree with the voice of common fame, which assigns it to him." But the question then arises, as to what degree of credit is due to the "Journal" or to the circumstances which it records; since De Foe was scarcely two years of age, when the Great Pestilence occurred which it affects so minutely to describe. His narrative, by one writer, has been styled "a pure fiction;" by another, it is described as being "as much a work of imagination as his Robinson Crusoe;" a third (the author of his "Memoirs") says, it would baffle the ingenuity of any one but De Foe to frame a history with so many attributes of truth upon the basis of fiction;" and a fourth, with a somewhat reprehensible ignorance, has included the "Journal of the Plague Year" in a collection of Novels.

Now De Foe's work is not a fiction, nor is it based upon fiction; and great injustice is done to his memory so to represent it. Most of the circumstances which it records, can be traced to different publications to which the writer had access, and which are still accessible; and it is extremely probable that a part of his information was actually derived from some diary, or manuscript observations, communicated to him by an individual of his own family,—and to whom he probably refers by the initials H. F., which are attached to the end of his "Journal."* It may be assumed also, in accounting for the individuality and minuteness of some of his details, that other manuscripts were in existence at the time when De Foe wrote, from which he derived information; for unquestionably, among those who resided in London during the dreadful Visitation of 1665, there must have been some who drew up memoirs, more or less extensive, relating to those extraordinary and appalling scenes and occurrences which distinguished the period in question.†

* It must be recollected, that the proper surname of this celebrated writer was Foe, and not De Foe, the prefix being an assumption of his own when advanced to manhood.

† An instance of this will be found in the "Loimographia" of Boghurst, whose manuscript is now preserved in the British Museum, and copious extracts from which are given in the Appendix, No. I., attached to this volume; and it is very probable that Boghurst's narrative had been perused by De Foe.

From considering the circumstances of the times when De Foe's work first appeared, which was in the year 1722, we may fairly conclude that the occasion of his compiling it,—for he was then reduced to mere authorship for his means of daily support,—was to take advantage of the strong excitement which the Plague at Marseilles had raised in the public mind, and which was mingled with fearful apprehensions lest the infection should again be introduced into this country. During the two preceding years, Marseilles had been ravaged by Pestilence in the most direful manner; and scarcely all the sufferings that had ever previously afflicted our own nation, could be compared with the heart-rending scenes which took place in that devoted city within that brief period.

The chief printed sources of De Foe's "Memoirs of the Plague Years," which is the secondary or running title at the head of the pages of his work, was the "Collection" of all the Bills of Mortality for 1665, published under the title of "London's Dreadful Visitation;" the Loimologia of Dr. Hodges; and "God's Terrible Voice in the City," by the Rev. Thomas Vincent, which appeared in 1667. The original edition of "Loimologia," which is in Latin, was published in 1672, in octavo; and again, enlarged and in quarto, in 1775: it was translated into English by Dr. Quincey, and republished in octavo in 1720.

No person who peruses De Foe's work, can avoid seeing how greatly he has been indebted to the Weekly Bills for the minute and comparative details which he continually introduces in respect to the numbers and localities of the deceased. Here, everything is in accordance with the strict facts: there is no display of imagination, and when the writer occasionally departs from the authorities before him, it is under circumstances which are strongly in favour of the correctness of his own observations.

With regard to the other works mentioned above, the following extracts will probably convince every reader of De Foe's "Journal," that he drew largely from those sources for the more ample account of the ravages of the Plague, which he himself composed;—and first from Dr. Hodges's "Loimologia."

"In the months of August and September, the contagion changed its former slow and languid pace, and having, as it were, got master of all, made a most terrible slaughter, so that three, four, or five thousand died in a week, and once eight thousand. Who can express the calamities of such times? The whole British nation wept for the miseries of her metropolis. In some houses carcases lay waiting for burial, and in others, persons in their last agonies; in one room might be heard dying groans, in another the ravings of a delirium, and not far off, relations and friends bewailing both their loss, and the dismal prospect of their own sudden departure; death was the sure midwife to all children, and infants passed immediately from the womb to the grave. Who would not burst with grief to see the stock for a future generation hang upon the breasts of a dead mother? Or the marriage bed changed the first night into a sepulchre, and the unhappy pair meet with death in their first embraces? Some of the infected run about staggering like drunken men, and fall and expire in the streets; while others lie half dead and comatose, but never to be waked but by the last trumpet; some lie vomiting as if they had drunk poison; and others fall dead in the market, while they are buying necessaries for the support of life."

"I was called to a girl the first day of her seizure, who breathed without any difficulty, her warmth was moderate and natural, her inwards free from glowing and pain, her pulse not unequal or irregular; but on the contrary, all things genuine and well, as if she had ailed nothing; and indeed, I was rather inclined to think she counterfeited being sick, than really to be out of order, until examining her breast, I found the certain characters of death imprinted in many places; and in that following night she died, before she herself or any person about her could discern her otherwise out of order."

Other passages, in immediate accordance with De Foe's narration, might easily be selected from the same work; —but the subjoined extracts from Mr. Vincent's tract will be seen to be still more decidedly analogous to the general tone and manner of our author.

"It was in the year of our Lord 1665, that the Plague began in our city of London; after we were warned by the Great Plague in Holland in the year 1664, and the beginning of it in some remote parts of our land in the same year; not to speak anything whether there was any signification and influence in the Blazing-star not long before, that appeared in the view of London, and struck some amazement upon the spirits of many. It was in the month of May that the Plague was first taken notice of: our bill of mortality did let us know but of three, which died of the disease in the whole year before; but in the beginning of May the Bill tells us of nine which fell by the Plague; one in the heart of the city, the other eight in the suburbs. This was the first arrow of warning that was shot from Heaven amongst us, and fear quickly begins to creep upon people's hearts; great thoughts and discourse there is in the town about the Plague, and they cast in their minds whither they should go if the Plague should increase. Yet when the next week's bill signifieth to them the decrease, from nine to three, their minds are something appeased; discourse of that subject cools; fears are hushed, and hopes take place, that the black cloud did but threaten, and give a few drops; but the wind would drive it away. But when in the next bill the number of the dead by the Plague is mounted from three to fourteen, and in the next to seventeen, and in the next to forty-three, and the disease begins so much to increase and disperse, sinners begin to be startled."

The Plague "is so deadly, it kills where it comes without mercy; it kills, I had almost said certainly: very few do escape especially upon its first entrance, and before its malignity be spent. Few are touched by it, but they are killed by it; and it kills suddenly. As it gives no warning before it comes, suddenly the arrow is shot which woundeth unto the heart; so it gives little time for preparation before it brings to the grave. Under other diseases, men may linger out many weeks and months; under some, divers years: but the Plague usually killeth within a few daies; sometimes, within a few hours after its first approach, though the body were never so strong and free from disease before."

Speaking of the month of June, he says,—“Now the citizens of London are put to a stop in the career of their trade; they begin to fear whom they converse withall, and deal withall, lest they should have come out of infected places: now roses and other sweet flowers wither in the gardens, are disregarded in the markets, and people dare not offer them to their noses, lest with their sweet savour, that which is infectious should be attracted. Rue and wormwood are taken into the hand; myrrh and zedoary into the mouth, and without some antidote few stir abroad in the morning. Now many houses are shut up where the Plague comes, and the inhabitants shut in, lest coming abroad they should spread the infection. It was very dismal to behold the red crosses, and read in great letters, Lord have mercy upon us, on the doors, and watchmen standing before them with halberts; and such a solitude about those places, and people passing by them so gingerly, and with such fearful looks, as if they had been lined with enemies in ambush, that waited to destroy them."

In July the Plague increaseth, and prevaieth exceedingly; the number of 470, which died in one week by the disease, ariseth to 725 the next week, to 1089 the next, to 1843 the next, and to 2010 the next. Now the Plague compasseth the walls of the city like a flood, and poureth in upon it. Now most parishes are infected, both without and within [the walls]; yea there are not so many houses shut up by the Plague as by the owners forsaking them for fear of it, and though the inhabitants be so exceedingly decreased by the departure of so many thousands, yet the number of dying persons doth increase fearfully. Now the countries keep guards, lest infectious persons should from the city bring the disease unto them. Most of the rich are now gone, and the middle sort will not stay behind; but the poor are forced through poverty to stay and abide the storm. The very sinking fears they have had of the Plague hath brought the Plague and death upon many. Some, by the sight of a coffin in the streets, have fallen into a shivering, and immediately the disease has assaulted them; and Sergeant Death hath arrested them, and clapt to the doors of their houses upon them, from whence they have come forth no more, till they have been brought to their graves."

“It would be endless to speak of what we have seen and heard of some in their frenzies rising out of their beds, and leaping about their rooms; others crying and roaring at their windows; some coming forth almost naked, and running into the streets. Strange things have others spoken and done when the disease was upon them; but it was very sad to hear of one, who, being sick and alone, and, it is like frantic, burnt himself in his bed.”

Many other citations might be made from the same writers to show how considerably De Foe was indebted to them for the general facts recorded in his “Journal.” But in almost every instance where he has thus acquired information, he has given additional interest to the subject by entering into a detail of circumstances which, if not to the letter true, still arrests belief from its strict accordance with what we feel conscious must have taken place in a season of such grievous suffering as he describes. “As De Foe” (says his more recent biographer Wilson) “was a mere child when the calamity happened, he could have no personal knowledge of the matters he has recorded. But the feelings arising from so awful a visitation would not subside suddenly. It would continue to be the talk of those who witnessed it for years afterwards, so that he must have been familiarised with the subject from his childhood; and as curiosity is most alive and the impressions strongest at that period, there can be no doubt that he treasured up many things in his memory, from the report of his parents and others, which he converted into useful materials as they passed through the operation of his own lively fancy.

It was De Foe’s peculiar talent to seize upon any popular subject, and convert it by his inimitable genius into a fruitful source of amusement and instruction. From his history of the Plague we may derive more information than from all the other publications upon the subject put together. He has collected all the facts attending the rise, progress, and termination of the malady, an accurate report of the number of deaths as published by authority, a faithful account of the regulations adopted to arrest and mitigate its fury, and numerous cases of infection, whether real or imaginary. But that which imparts life to the whole, and forms its distinguishing feature, is its descriptive imagery. The author's object is not so much to detail the deadly consequences of the disorder, as to delineate its effects upon the frightened minds of the inhabitants. These are depicted with all the genuine pathos of nature, without any aim at effect, but with the ease and simplicity of real life. The numerous incidents that follow in rapid succession, fraught as they are with human misery, present, at the same time, an accurate picture of life and manners in the metropolis, at the period referred to. The style and dress, the language and ideas, are exactly those of a citizen of London at the latter end of the 17th century.*

When the notes and other papers attached to this edition are considered with reference to the circumstances stated by De Foe, there can be no hesitation in subscribing to the general authenticity of his production;—although, perhaps, in a few instances, as in that of the interview with the waterman at Blackwall, in the story of the joiner and his companions, and in the account of the awfully wicked conduct of the frequenters of the Pye tavern, he has apparently given a more heightened effect to the occurrences related, than the strict truth can warrant. In his character of a journalist and tradesman, whatever may have been the real sources of his information, he has composed a far superior History of the Plague Year than any other writer whatever; and it is a remarkable fact, that many of the events which he records, derive a collateral support from the respective diaries of Pepys, Evelyn, and Lord Clarendon,—works which were not published until long, very long after his decease, and the manuscripts of which he could never have perused. His narration, indeed, has such a decided air of verisimilitude, that Mr. Wilson has remarked,—

“No one can take up the book without believing that it is the saddler of Whitechapel who is telling his own story; that he was an eye-witness to all that he relates; that he actually saw the blazing stars which portended the calamity; that he witnessed the grass growing in the streets, read the inscriptions upon the doors of the infected houses; heard the bell-man crying, ‘Bring out your dead!’ saw the dead-carts conveying the people to their graves; and was present at the digging of the pits in which they were deposited. In this indeed consists the charm of the narrative. It is not merely a record of the transactions that happened during the calamity, nor even of private circumstances that would escape the public eye: it is rather the familiar recital of a man’s own observations upon all that passed before him, possessing all the minuteness of a log-book without its dulness.”

That an event of such fearful interest as the Plague of 1665, should have been dismissed from the pages of the historians Rapin and Hume in little more than a single sentence is highly extraordinary, but such is the case. It is not less remarkable, that Dr. Lingard (who does justice to its importance) has been almost wholly indebted for his eloquent description of this appalling scourge to De Foe's "Journal." By avoiding the redundancy, and generalising the details of that writer, he has composed such a terrific picture of the ravages of the Pestilence that it can only be paralleled by the celebrated delineation of the Plague of Athens by the classic pencil of Thucydides. It has the same nervous force, and vividness and fidelity of representation; and we behold in it, as in a mirror, the fell triumph of the grim king of terrors;—the last thrill of suffering humanity, sinking into the grave in wretchedness and despair.

Except his inimitable "Robinson Crusoe," none of the productions of De Foe ever attained such a high degree of popular celebrity as his "Journal of the Plague Year." The subject is one of the most fearful that can be met with in the annals of the human race. It connects itself in a remarkable degree, with the ideas we entertain of an immediate judgment of Heaven; and it has been so treated by almost every serious writer, from the time of Moses, even to our own age.* That impression seems to have acted strongly upon the mind of De Foe; and it has imparted a high moral character to his work, which renders the interest it excites of ten-fold value, because it tends both to improve the heart and to inculcate the great

* In almost every age, and among even the most idolatrous nations, Pestilence has been regarded as "an especial instrument of Divine anger;" and it is probably with reference to the deep interest which this belief excites, in the generality of mankind, that both historians and poets have so often vied with each other in their gloomy details of its ravages. "Neither war with all its pomp, nor the earthquake, nor the tempest in its overwhelming fury, has been more distinctly personified than the Pestilence that walketh in darkness.—It is with the description of a Plague that Homer begins his sublime poem; and the noblest of Grecian tragedies [the Œdipus Tyrannus of Sophocles] is commenced in a similar manner: and in both cases, contagion is the immediate messenger of Heavenly wrath."—See Stebbing's "Introduction" to the "History of the Plague Year," 1832.

lessons of humility and pious reverence. "De Foe is never so much at home as when he is inviting men to repentance and reformation; yet he never goes out of his way for the purpose, but seizes upon incidents as they arise, and are calculated by their nature to give effect to his admonitions."

Were De Foe's "Journal" to be critically examined, it would be found that the vivid impression which it makes upon the reader is, in a considerable degree, dependent on the frequent recurrence of the same images. The ease, and almost colloquial familiarity of his language, is another great cause of its success in interesting the feelings. The most appalling events are related with the plainness and simplicity of conversation. There is no straining for effect, nor is the garb of a pompous phraseology ever assumed to disguise the simple matter-of-fact, and show how the writer can shine at the expense of his subject.

In concluding these remarks, the Editor will advert to one circumstance of an historical nature, in which De Foe's work has misled many; and that is, as to the time of the cessation of the Plague in this country. No reader of the "Journal" can rise from perusing it, without being impressed with the idea that the Plague entirely ceased with us, early in 1666; but such was not the fact. In the course of that year, nearly two thousand persons fell victims to its ravages in London alone; and it still continued slightly to infect the metropolis until 1679, which is the last year that any deaths from Plague were recorded in the bills of mortality.

Since its first publication in 1722, numerous editions of De Foe's work have been issued from the press, but on no one of them was a proper attention to correctness ever bestowed. That fault has been avoided on the present occasion. The work has been reprinted from the original edition, (which is now extremely scarce,) and its revision has been carefully attended to. Numerous errors, both of grammar and in pointing, have been corrected, and such other amendments made as came strictly within the compass of editorial duty.

In most of the reprints of De Foe's "Journal" of the Plague Year," that title has been changed into the "History of the Great Plague." In the present instance, the Editor has restored both the original title and the half-title as they stand in the edition of 1722.

The subjoined TABLE, which has been drawn up from Original documents in the possession of the Company of Parish Clerks, and is now first printed, will show the weekly returns of Deaths by Plague, from the 19th of December 1665 to the 18th of December 1666. During the confusion occasioned by the Great Fire in September, 1666, the accounts for three weeks were merged into one total.

---

It was about the beginning of September, 1664, that I, among the rest of my neighbours, heard, in ordinary discourse, that the Plague was returned again in Holland; for it had been very violent there, and particularly at Amsterdam and Rotterdam, in the year 1663, whither they say it was brought, some said from Italy, others from the Levant, among some goods which were brought home by their Turkey fleet; others said it was brought from Candia; others, from Cyprus. It mattered not from whence it came; but all agreed it was come into Holland again.*

We had no such thing as printed newspapers in those * In Pepys's "Diary," (vol. ii. pp. 105, 111, under the dates of October 19th, and 30th, 1663,) are the following early notices of the approaching Pestilence—"To the Coffee-house in Cornhill, where much talk about the Turkes proceedings, and that the Plague is got to Amsterdam, brought by a ship from Argier, and it is also carried to Hambrough."—"The Plague is much in Amsterdam, and we in fear of it here, which God defend." During the following month, the Infection continued to spread in both the above places, and all ships coming thence to England were enjoined by an Order of Council to perform a "Quarantine" of thirty days in Hole-haven.

On the 16th of June, 1664, Pepys wrote:—"The talk upon the 'Change is, that De Ruyter is dead, with fifty men of his own ship, of the Plague at Cales." This report, as far as regarded De Ruyter, was not correct: that intrepid commander survived until April 1676, when he was mortally wounded by a canon-shot, in an engagement, days, to spread rumours and reports of things;* and to improve them by the invention of men, as I have lived to see practised since. But such things as these were gathered from the letters of merchants and others, who corresponded abroad, and from them were handed about by word of mouth only; so that things did not spread instantly over the whole nation, as they do now. But it seems that the Government had a true account of it, and several councils were held about ways to prevent its coming over; but all was kept very private. Hence it was, that this rumour died off again, and people began to forget it as a thing we were very little concerned in, and that we hoped was not true; till the latter end of November, or the beginning of December, 1664, when with the French fleet, near Messina. Many, however, died of the Plague in De Ruyter's fleet, about the above time.

Dr. Hodges (author of "Loimologia," &c., who, after practising with great success in London, during the time of the Plague, died poor in Ludgate, about 1684) speaks thus of the origin of the Infection in his "Letter to a Person of Quality, on the Rise, Progress, Symptoms, and Cure of the Plague:"—"After the most strict and serious inquiry; by undoubted testimonies, I find that this Pest was communicated to us from the Netherlands by way of contagion; and if the most probable relations deceive me not, it came from Smyrna to Holland, in a parcel of infected goods." See "Collection of very scarce and valuable pieces relating to the last Plague in the year 1665." 2nd edit. 1721. 8vo, p. 14.

* This is not strictly accurate. Newspapers had been published occasionally in the reign of Queen Elizabeth; and also, periodically, during the Civil War in Charles the First's time, and during the subsequent Protectorate or Interregnum. The "Intelligencer" was commenced by Sir Roger L'Estrange, in December, 1664; and the "Newes," also by him, on the third day afterwards; and those papers were continued to be published, in alternate succession, twice a week for some years. The "Gazette," No. I. "Published by authority," at Oxford, where the Court then resided, appeared in November 1665. It has no proper date; but the first article in it, dated Oxon. Nov. 7, is the announcement of the election of the Rev. Dr. Walter Blandford, Warden of Wadham Coll., to the Bishopric, vacant by the death of Dr. Paul. At the end of this Gazette, we are told "The account of the Weekly Bill at London runs thus:—Total 1359. Plague 1050. Decreased 418."

The Oxford Gazette, No. 24, was the first "London Gazette," and bears the dates of February 1st, 1665-6, two men, said to be Frenchmen, died of the Plague in Long-acre, or rather at the upper end of Drury-lane. The family they were in endeavoured to conceal it as much as possible; but as it had gotten some vent in the discourse of the neighbourhood, the Secretaries of State got knowledge of it; and concerning themselves to inquire about it, in order to be certain of the truth, two physicians and a surgeon were ordered to go to the house and make inspection. This they did; and finding evident tokens of the sickness upon both the bodies that were dead, they gave their opinions publicly, that they died of the plague: whereupon it was given in to the parish clerk, and he also returned them to the hall, and it was printed in the weekly Bill of Mortality in the usual manner, thus:—

Plague 2.—Parishes infected, 1.*

The people showed a great concern at this, and began

In the latter year, viz. 1664, there were four parishes infected. One person died in St. Botolph's, Aldgate; one in St. Giles's, Cripplegate, three in St. Mary's, Whitechapel; and one in St. Giles's-in-the-Fields. The unwonted alarm, therefore, which existed at this time, must have arisen not so much from the knowledge that the Plague was already in London, as from the mortality occasioned by it in Holland; where at Amsterdam alone, in the above year, more than 24,000 persons are said to have fallen victims to its ravages. In fact, there had scarcely been a single twelvemonth from the commencement of the century, during which London had been entirely free from this infection. In 1603, no fewer than 36,269 persons are recorded to have died in the metropolis of the Plague; in 1625, there perished here 35,417; and in 1636, full 10,400. In many of the intermediate years, the deaths from Pestilence amounted to two, three, and even four thousand and upwards.

to be alarmed all over the town, and the more, because, in the last week in December 1664, another man died in the same house, and of the same distemper: and then we were easy again for about six weeks, when, none having died with any marks of infection, it was said the distemper was gone; but after that, I think it was about the 12th of February, another died in another house, but in the same parish, and in the same manner.

This turned the people's eyes pretty much towards that end of the town; and the Weekly Bills showing an increase of burials in St. Giles's parish more than usual, it began to be suspected that the Plague was among the people at that end of the town, and that many had died of it, though they had taken care to keep it as much from the knowledge of the public as possible. This possessed the heads of the people very much, and few cared to go through Drury-lane, or the other streets suspected, unless they had extraordinary business, that obliged them to it.

This increase of the Bills stood thus:—The usual number of burials in a week, in the parishes of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, and St. Andrew, Holborn, were from twelve to seventeen or nineteen each, few more or less; but from the time that the Plague first began in St. Giles's parish, it was observed, that the ordinary burials increased in number considerably. For example:—

From Dec. 27 to Jan. 3—	St. Giles's	16
	St. Andrew's	17
Jan. 3 to Jan. 10—	St. Giles's	12
	St. Andrew's	25
Jan. 10 to Jan. 17—	St. Giles's	18
	St. Andrew's	18
Jan. 17 to Jan. 24—	St. Giles's	23
	St. Andrew's	16
Jan. 24 to Jan. 31—	St. Giles's	24
	St. Andrew's	15
Jan. 31 to Feb. 7—	St. Giles's	21
	St. Andrew's	23
Feb. 7 to Feb. 14—	St. Giles's	24
	whereof	1 of the plague.

The like increase of the Bills was observed in the parish of St. Bride, adjoining on one side of Holborn parish, and in the parish of St. James, Clerkenwell, adjoining on the other side of Holborn: in both which parishes, the usual numbers that died weekly, were from four to six or eight: whereas at that time they were increased, as follows:—

From Dec. 20 to Dec. 27—	St. Bride's	0
	St. James's	8
Dec. 27 to Jan. 3—	St. Bride's	6
	St. James's	9
Jan. 3 to Jan. 10—	St. Bride's	11
	St. James's	7
Jan. 10 to Jan. 17—	St. Bride's	12
	St. James's	9
Jan. 17 to Jan. 24—	St. Bride's	9
	St. James's	15
Jan. 24 to Jan. 31—	St. Bride's	8
	St. James's	12
Jan. 31 to Feb. 7—	St. Bride's	13
	St. James's	5
Feb. 7 to Feb. 14—	St. Bride's	12
	St. James's	6

Besides this, it was observed with great uneasiness by the people, that the Weekly Bills in general increased very much during these weeks, although it was at a time of the year when usually the Bills are very moderate.

The usual number of burials within the Bills of Mortality for a week, was from about 240 or thereabouts, to 300. The last was esteemed a pretty high Bill; but after this we found the Bills successively increasing as follows:—

	Buried.	Increased.
From Dec. 20 to Dec. 27.....	291	—
Dec. 27 to Jan. 3.....	349	58
Jan. 3 to Jan. 10.....	394	45
Jan. 10 to Jan. 17.....	415	21
Jan. 17 to Jan. 24.....	474	59

This last Bill was really frightful, being a higher number than had been known to have been buried in one week, since the preceding Visitation of 1636.*

However, all this went off again, and the weather proving cold, and the frost, which began in December, still continuing very severe, even till near the end of February,† attended with sharp though moderate winds, the Bills decreased again, and the city [town] grew healthy, and every body began to look upon the danger as good as over; only that still the burials in St. Giles's continued high: from the beginning of April especially, they stood at twenty-five each week, till the week from the 18th to the 25th, when there was buried in St. Giles's parish thirty, whereof two of the Plague, and eight of the spotted fever, which was looked upon as the same thing; likewise the number that died of the spotted fever in the whole increased, being eight the week before, and twelve the week above-named.

* In March, 1665, the importation of English Manufactures, even to Beer, was prohibited in Holland (on account of the Plague), under a penalty of 1000 guilders, besides confiscation of the property. This, probably, was in retaliation for the Government measure of the preceding year, when the King (Charles II.) excused his prohibition of merchandise from Holland, "on account of the Plague having been introduced into that Country."

"We have had our part here of the Comet, as well as other places, besides which here have been other terrible apparitions and noises in the ayre, as fires and sounds of cannon and musket shot; and here has likewise appeared several times the resemblance of a Black Man, which has made our Sentinels to quit their posts; and one of them was lately thrown down by him from the top of the wall." Vide "The Newes," published for the Satisfaction and Information of the People: (with Privilege) Numb. 2.

This alarmed us all again, and terrible apprehensions were among the people, especially the weather being now changed and growing warm, and the summer being at hand. However, the next week there seemed to be some hopes again, the Bills were low, the number of the dead in all was but 388, there was none of the Plague, and but four of the spotted fever.

But the following week it returned again, and the distemper was spread into two or three other parishes, viz., St. Andrew's, Holborn; St. Clement's Danes; and, to the great affliction of the city, one died within the walls, in the parish of St. Mary Wool-church, that is to say, in Bearbinder lane, near Stocks market;* in all there were nine of the Plague, and six of the spotted fever. It was, however, upon inquiry, found, that this Frenchman, who died in Bearbinder-lane, was one who, having lived in Long-acre, near the infected houses, had removed for fear of the distemper, not knowing that he was already infected.

This was the beginning of May, yet the weather was temperate, variable, and cool enough, and people had still some hopes. That which encouraged them was, that the City was healthy: the whole ninety-seven parishes buried but fifty-four,† and we began to hope, that as it was * Stocks-market was then kept on the ground now occupied by the Mansion-house. Latterly it was most known as a herb and poultry market.

† The Parish Registers in England were commenced in 1538, in consequence of one of the seventeen injunctions set forth in that year in the name of the King [Henry VIII.] by the Lord Thomas Cromwell, his vicegerent in ecclesiastical matters, which injunction appointed that the Parson, Vicar, or Curate, of every parish should keep a true and exact Register of all Weddings, Christenings, and Burials; and the weekly Bills of Mortality, containing an account of Christenings as well as Burials, taken by the Company of Parish Clerks of London, had their rise the 21st of December, 1592. In 1594, the particular or weekly account of both Christenings and Burials was first made public, as also chiefly among the people at the other end of the town, it might go no farther; and the rather, because the next week, which was from the 9th of May to the 16th, there died but three, of which not one within the whole City or Liberties, and St. Andrew's buried but fifteen, which was very low. It is true, St. Giles's buried two-and-thirty; but still, as there was but one of the Plague, people began to be easy: the whole Bill also was very low; for the week before the Bill was but 347, and the week above-mentioned, but 343. We continued in these hopes for a few days; but it was but for a few, for the people were no more to be deceived thus: they searched the houses, and found that the Plague was really spread every way, and that many died of it every day; so that now all our extenuations abated, and it was no more to be concealed; nay, it quickly appeared, that the infection had spread itself beyond all hopes of abatement: that in the parish of St. Giles it was gotten into several streets, and several families lay all sick together; and, accordingly, in the weekly Bill for the next week, the thing began to show itself. There was, indeed, but fourteen set down of the Plague; but this was all knavery and collusion, for in St. Giles's parish they buried forty in all, whereof it was the general or yearly account, until the 18th of December, 1595, when it was discontinued upon the ceasing of the Plague.

It is here to be remarked, that the Bill of Mortality, now in its infancy, consisted of but 109 parishes; which were then only alphabetically set down, without making any distinction of the out-parishes from those within the walls; whereas afterwards, in 1665, when Mr. John Bell, clerk of the Company of Parish Clerks, published at London, in 4to, his "London's Remembrancer, or a True Account of every particular Week's Christenings and Mortality in all the years of Pestilence within the Bills of Mortality," the said Bills comprehended 130 parishes; and distinguished the parishes by the four divisions of the Ninety-seven parishes within the walls, the Sixteen parishes without the walls, the Twelve out-parishes in Middlesex and Surrey, and the Five parishes in the City and Liberties of Westminster. See MSS. in the British Museum, Ayscough's Catalogue, No. 4213.

was certain that most of them died of the Plague, though they were set down of other distempers; and though the number of all the burials was not increased above thirty-two, the whole Bill being but 385, yet there were fourteen of the spotted fever, as well as fourteen of the Plague; and we took it for granted upon the whole, that there were fifty died that week of the Plague.

The next Bill was from the 23rd of May to the 30th, when the number of the Plague was seventeen;* but the burials in St. Giles's were fifty-three, a frightful number! of whom they set down but nine of the Plague: but on an examination more strictly by the Justices of the peace, and at the Lord Mayor's request, it was found that there were twenty more, who were really dead of the Plague in that parish, but had been set down of the spotted fever or other distempers, besides others concealed.

But those were trifling things to what followed immediately after; for now the weather set in hot,† and from the first week in June, the infection spread in a dreadful manner, and the Bills rose high: the articles of the fever, spotted fever, and teeth, began to swell; for all that could conceal their distempers did it, to prevent their neighbours' shunning and refusing to converse with them; and also to prevent authority shutting up their houses, which,

* May 24th.—“To the Coffee-house, where all the news is of the Dutch being gone out, and of the Plague growing upon us in this town, and of the remedies against it; some saying one thing and some another.”—Pepys's “Diary.”

† The heat of the weather at this period is thus alluded to by Pepys, under the date of June 7th.—“The hottest day that ever I felt in my life. This day, much against my will, I did in Drury-lane see two or three houses marked with a Red Cross upon the doors, and ‘Lord have Mercy upon us,’ writ there; which was a sad sight to me, being the first of the kind that to my remembrance I ever saw.” Again, on the 16th of July, Pepys wrote thus:—“Lord's day.—It was most extraordinary hot as ever I knew it.”

though it was not yet practised, was yet threatened, and people were extremely terrified at the thoughts of it.

The second week in June, the parish of St. Giles, where still the weight of the Infection lay, buried 120, whereof though the Bills said but sixty-eight of the Plague, everybody said there had been 100 at least, calculating it from the usual number of funerals in that parish as above.

Till this week the city continued free, there having never any died except that one Frenchman whom I mentioned before, within the whole ninety-seven parishes. Now there died four within the city, one in Wood-street, one in Fenchurch-street, and two in Crooked-lane. Southwark was entirely free, not one having yet died on that side of the water.

I lived without Aldgate, about mid-way between Aldgate church and Whitechapel bars, on the left hand, or north side, of the street; and as the Distemper had not reached to that side of the city, our neighbourhood continued very easy; but at the other end of the town, their consternation was very great; and the richer sort of people, especially the nobility and gentry, from the west part of the city, thronged out of town with their families and servants, in an unusual manner; and this was more particularly seen in Whitechapel; that is to say, the broad street where I lived. Indeed nothing was to be seen but waggons and carts, with goods, women, servants, children, &c. Coaches filled with people of the better sort, and horsemen attending them, and all hurrying away; besides innumerable numbers of men on horseback, some alone, others with servants, and generally speaking, all loaded with baggage and fitted out for travelling, as any one might perceive by their appearance. Then empty waggons and carts appeared, and spare horses with servants, who it was apparent were returning or sent from the country to fetch more people.

This was a very terrible and melancholy thing to see, and as it was a sight which I could not but look on from morning to night, for indeed there was nothing else of moment to be seen, it filled me with very serious thoughts of the misery that was coming upon the City, and the unhappy condition of those who would be left in it.

This hurry of the people was such for some weeks, that there was no getting at the Lord Mayor's door without exceeding difficulty; there was such pressing and crowding there to get passes and certificates of Health, for such as travelled abroad; for without these, there was no being admitted to pass through the towns upon the road, nor to lodge in any inn. Now, as there had none died in the City for all this time, my Lord Mayor gave certificates of Health without any difficulty to all those who lived in the 97 parishes, and to those within the Liberties too for a while.*

* The rapid increase of the Plague in the month of June, and the haste with which the people departed from the metropolis, are noticed in various passages of Pepys's "Diary:" vol. ii. for instance: June 17th.—"It struck me very deep this afternoon going with a hackney coach from [the] Lord Treasurer's down Holborne, the Coachman I found to drive easily and easily, at last stood still, and came down hardly able to stand, and told me that he was suddenly struck very sick, and almost blind, he could not see; so I light and went into another coach, with a sad heart for the poor man, and for myself also, lest he should have been struck with the Plague."

June 20th.—"This day I informed myself that there died four or five at Westminster, of the Plague, in several houses upon Sunday last, in Bell-alley, over against the Palace-gate."

June 21st.—"I find all the town going out of town, the coaches and carriages being all full of people going into the country."

June 25th.—"The Plague increases mightily. I this day seeing a house, at a bitt-maker's over against St. Clement's church, in the open street, shut up; which is a sad sight."

June 28th.—"In my way to Westminster Hall, I observed several Plague houses in King's-street and the Palace."

This hurry, I say, continued some weeks, that is to say, all the month of May and June, and the more, because it was rumoured that an Order of the Government was to be issued out, to place turnpikes and barriers on the road, to prevent people's travelling; and that the towns on the road would not suffer people from London to pass, for fear of bringing the infection along with them; though neither of these rumours had any foundation, but in the imagination, especially at first.*

I now began to consider seriously with myself, concerning my own case, and how I should dispose of myself; that is to say, whether I should resolve to stay in London, or shut up my house and flee, as many of my neighbours did. I have set this particular down so fully; because I know not but it may be of moment to those who come after me, if they come to be brought to the same distress, and to the same manner of making their choice; and therefore I desire this account may pass with them, rather for a direction to themselves to act by, than a history of my actings, seeing it may not be of one farthing value to them to note what became of me.

June 29th.—“To Whitehall, where the court was full of waggons and people ready to go out of town. This end of the town every day grows very bad of the Plague. The Mortality Bill is come to 267; which is about ninety more than the last.—Home; calling at Somerset House, where all were packing up too.”

* On the 13th of May, a Court of Privy Council was held at Whitehall, when a Committee of the Lords was formed for “Prevention of the spreading of the Infection,” and under their orders a small 4to pamphlet was issued, intituled “Certain necessary Directions, as well for the Cure of the Plague, as for Preventing the Infection;” which had been drawn up by the College of Physicians in the latter part of that month. Among some of the remedies therein prescribed, and which might be termed ludicrous in the present advanced state of medical science, is the following:—“Pull off the feathers from the tails of living cocks, hens, pigeons, or chickens; and holding their bills, hold them hard to the botch or swelling, and so keep them at that part till they die, and by this means draw out the poison. It is good to apply a cupping-glass, or embers in a dish, with a handful of sorrel upon the embers.”

I had two important things before me;—the one was the carrying on my business and shop, which was considerable, and in which was embarked all my effects in the world; and the other was the preservation of my life in so dismal a calamity, as I saw apparently was coming upon the whole city; and which, however great it was, my fears perhaps, as well as other people's, represented to be much greater than it could be.

The first consideration was of great moment to me; my trade was a Saddler's; and as my dealings were chiefly not by a shop or chance trade, but among the merchants trading to the English colonies in America, so my effects lay very much in the hands of such. I was a single man, 'tis true; but I had a family of servants, whom I kept at my business, had a house, shop, and warehouses filled with goods; and, in short, to leave them all, as things in such a case must be left, that is to say, without any overseer or person fit to be trusted with them, had been to hazard the loss not only of my trade, but of my goods, and indeed of all I had in the world.

I had an elder Brother at the same time in London, and not many years before come over from Portugal; and advising with him, his answer was in three words, the same that was given in another case quite different, viz., "Master, save thyself." In a word, he was for my retiring into the country, as he resolved to do himself with his family; telling me, what he had, it seems, heard abroad, that "the best preparation for the Plague was to run away from it." As to my argument of losing my trade, my goods, or debts, he quite confuted me. He told me the same thing which I argued for my staying, viz., "that I would trust God with my safety and health," was the strongest repulse to my pretensions of losing my trade and my goods; for, says he, "Is it not as reasonable that you should trust God with the chance or risk of losing your trade, as that you should stay in so imminent a point of danger, and trust him with your life?"

I could not argue that I was in any strait, as to a place where to go, having several friends and relations in Northamptonshire, whence our family first came from; and particularly, I had an only sister in Lincolnshire, very willing to receive and entertain me.

My brother, who had already sent his wife and two children into Bedfordshire, and resolved to follow them, pressed my going very earnestly; and I at once resolved to comply with his desires, but at that time could get no horse: for though it is true, all the people did not go out of the city of London; yet I may venture to say, that, in a manner, all the horses did; for there was hardly a horse to be bought or hired in the whole city for some weeks. Once I resolved to travel on foot with one servant; and, as many did, lie at no inn, but carry a soldier's tent with us, and so lie in the fields, the weather being very warm, and no danger from taking cold: I say, as many did, because several did so at last, especially those who had been in the armies, in the war which had not been many years past; and I must needs say that, speaking of second causes, had most of the people that travelled done so, the Plague had not been carried into so many country-towns and houses as it was, to the great damage, and indeed to the ruin, of abundance of people.

But then my servant, whom I had intended to take down with me, deceived me; and being frighted at the increase of the Distemper, and not knowing when I should go, he took other measures, and left me, so I was put off for that time; and one way or other, I always found, that to appoint to go away was always crossed by some accident or other, so as to disappoint and put it off again; and this brings in a story, which otherwise might be thought a needless digression, viz., about these disappointments being from Heaven.

I mention this story also as the best method I can advise any person to take in such a case, especially if he be one that makes conscience of his duty, and would be directed what to do in it; namely, that he should keep his eye upon the particular Providences which occur at that time, and look upon them complexly, as they regard one another, and as altogether regard the question before him; and then I think he may safely take them for intimations from Heaven of what is his unquestioned duty to do in such a case; I mean as to going away from, or staying in, the place where we dwell, when visited with an infectious distemper.

It came very warmly into my mind, one morning, as I was musing on this particular thing, that as nothing attended us without the direction or permission of Divine power, so these disappointments must have something in them extraordinary; and I ought to consider, whether it did not evidently point out or intimate to me, that it was the will of Heaven I should not go. It immediately followed in my thoughts, that if it really was from God that I should stay, he was able effectually to preserve me in the midst of all the death and danger that would surround me; and that if I attempted to secure myself by fleeing from my habitation, and acted contrary to these intimations which I believe to be Divine, it was a kind of flying from God, and that he could cause his justice to overtake me when and where he thought fit.

These thoughts quite turned my resolutions again ; and when I came to discourse with my Brother again, I told him “ that I inclined to stay and take my lot in that station in which God had placed me ; and that it seemed to be made more especially my duty, on the account of what I have said.”

My Brother, though a very religious man himself, laughed at all I had suggested about its being an intimation from Heaven, and told me several stories of such foolhardy people, as he called them, as I was ; that I ought, indeed, to submit to it as a work of Heaven, if I had been any way disabled by distempers or diseases, and that then not being able to go, I ought to acquiesce in the direction of Him, who having been my Maker had an undisputed right of sovereignty in disposing of me ; and that then there had been no difficulty to determine which was the Call of his Providence and which was not. But that I should take it as an intimation from Heaven, that I should not go out of town, only because I could not hire a horse to go, or my fellow was run away that was to attend me, was ridiculous ; since, at the same time I had my health and limbs, and other servants, and might, with ease, travel a day or two on foot ; and having a good certificate of being in perfect health, might either hire a horse, or take post on the road, as I thought fit.

Then he proceeded to tell me of the mischievous consequences which attended the presumption of the Turks and Mahometans in Asia and in other places, where he had been (for my Brother being a merchant, was, a few years before, as I have already observed, returned from abroad, coming last from Lisbon), and “ how, presuming upon their professed predestinating notions, and of every man’s end being predetermined and unalterably beforehand decreed, they would go unconcerned into infected places, and converse with infected persons, by which means they died at the rate of ten or fifteen thousand a week ; whereas the Europeans or Christian merchants, who kept themselves retired and reserved, generally escaped the contagion."

Upon these arguments my Brother changed my resolutions again, and I began to resolve to go, and accordingly made all things ready ; for, in short, the Infection increased around me, and the bills were risen to almost 700 a week, and my Brother told me he would venture to stay no longer. I desired him to let me consider of it but till the next day, and I would resolve ; and as I had already prepared everything as well as I could, as to my business, and who to intrust my affairs with, I had but little to do but to resolve.

I went home that evening greatly oppressed in my mind, irresolute, and not knowing what to do : I had set the evening wholly apart to consider seriously about it, and was all alone ; for already people had, as it were by a general consent, taken up the custom of not going out of doors after sunset ; the reasons I shall have occasion to say more of by-and-by.

In the retirement of this evening I endeavoured to resolve first, what it was my duty to do ; and I stated the arguments with which my Brother had pressed me to go into the country, and I set against them the strong impressions which I had on my mind for staying ; the visible call I seemed to have from the particular circumstance of my calling, and the care due from me for the preservation of my effects, which were, as I might say, my estate ; also the intimations which I thought I had from Heaven, that to me signified a kind of direction to venture, and it occurred to me, that if I had what I might call a direction to stay, I ought to suppose it contained a promise of being preserved, if I obeyed.

This lay close to me, and my mind seemed more and more encouraged to stay than ever, and supported with a secret satisfaction that I should be kept. Add to this, that turning over the Bible which lay before me, and while my thoughts were more than ordinarily serious upon the question, I cried out, "Well, I know not what to do; Lord, direct me!" and the like; and, at that juncture, I happened to stop turning over the book, at the ninety-first Psalm; and casting my eye on the second verse, I read on to the seventh verse inclusive; and after that included the tenth, as follows:—"I will say of the Lord, he is my refuge and my fortress; my God, in him will I trust. Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence. He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust; his truth shall be thy shield and buckler. Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day; nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness; nor for the destruction that wasteth at noon day. A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee. Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked. Because thou hast made the Lord, which is my refuge, even the Most High, thy habitation, there shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling," &c.

I scarce need tell the reader, that from that moment I resolved that I would stay in the town; and casting myself entirely upon the goodness and protection of the Almighty, would not seek any other shelter whatever; and that as my times were in His hands, he was as able to keep me in a Time of Infection as in a Time of Health ; and if he did not think fit to deliver me, still I was in His hands, and it was meet he should do with me as should seem good to Him.

With this resolution I went to bed ; and I was further confirmed in it the next day, by the woman being taken ill with whom I had intended to intrust my house, and all my affairs. But I had a farther obligation laid on me on the same side ; for the next day I found myself very much out of order also ; so that if I would have gone away, I could not, and I continued ill three or four days, and this entirely determined my stay ; so I took my leave of my Brother, who went away to Dorking, in Surrey, and afterwards fetched a round farther into Buckinghamshire, or Bedfordshire, to a retreat he had found out there for his family.

It was a very ill time to be sick in ; for if any one complained, it was immediately said he had the Plague ; and though I had, indeed, no symptoms of that distemper, yet being very ill, both in my head, and in my stomach, I was not without apprehension that I really was affected ; but in about three days I grew better ; the third night rested well, sweated a little, and was much refreshed : the apprehensions of its being the Infection went also quite away with my illness, and I went about my business as usual.

These things, however, put off all my thoughts of going into the country ; and my Brother also being gone, I had no more debate, either with him, or with myself, on that subject.

It was now mid-July, and the Plague, which had chiefly raged at the other end of the town, and as I said before, in the parishes of St. Giles, St. Andrew, Holborn, and towards Westminster, began now to come eastward towards the part where I lived.* It was to be observed, indeed, that it did not come straight on towards us; for the City, that is to say, within the walls, was indifferent healthy still; nor was it got then very much over the water into Southwark, for though there died that week 1268 of all distempers, whereof it might be supposed above 900 died of the Plague, yet there were but twenty-eight in the whole City, within the walls, and but nineteen in Southwark, Lambeth parish included; whereas, in the parishes of St. Giles and St. Martin-in-the-Fields, alone, there died 421.

But we perceived the Infection kept chiefly in the out-parishes, which being very populous, and fuller also of poor, the Distemper found more to prey upon than in the City, as I shall observe afterwards; we perceived, I say, the Distemper to draw our way, viz. by the parishes of Clerkenwell, Cripplegate, Shoreditch, and Bishopsgate; which last two parishes joining to Aldgate, Whitechapel, and Stepney, the Infection came at length to spread its utmost rage and violence in those parts, even when it abated at the western parishes where it began.

It was very strange to observe, that in this particular week, from the fourth to the eleventh of July, when, as I have observed, there died near 400 of the Plague in the two parishes of St. Martin and St. Giles in the Fields only, there died in the parish of Aldgate but four, in the parish of Whitechapel three, in the parish of Stepney but one.

Likewise, in the next week, from the eleventh of July

* July 6th.—“I could not see Lord Brouncker, nor had much mind, one of the great houses within two doors of him [in Covent Garden] being shut up: and Lord! the number of houses visited, which this day I observed through the town, quite round in my way by Long Lane and London Wall.”—Pepys's “Diary.”

to the eighteenth, when the week's Bill was 1761, yet there died no more of the Plague, on the whole Southwark side of the water, than sixteen.*

But this face of things soon changed, and it began to thicken, in Cripplegate parish especially, and in Clerkenwell; so that by the second week in August, Cripplegate parish alone buried 886, and Clerkenwell 155; of the first, 850 might well be reckoned to die of the Plague; and of the last, the Bill itself said, 145 were of the Plague.

During the month of July, and while, as I have observed, our part of the town seemed to be spared, in comparison of the west part,† I went ordinarily about the streets, as my business required, and particularly went, generally, once in a day, or in two days, into the City, to my Brother's house, which he had given me charge of, and to see if it was safe: and having the key in my pocket, I used to go over the house, and over most of the rooms, to see that all was well; for though it be something wonderful to tell, that any should have hearts so hardened, in the midst of such a calamity, as to rob and steal, yet certain it is, that all sorts of villanies, and even levities and debaucheries, were then practised in the town, as openly as ever; I will not say quite as frequently, because the numbers of people were many ways lessened.

* "The wind blowing westward [from the east] so long together, from before Christmas until July, about seven months, was the cause the Plague began first at the west end of the town, as at St. Giles', and St. Martin's Westminster. Afterwards it gradually insinuated and crept down Holborn and the Strand, and then into the City, and at last to the east end of the suburbs; so that it was half a year at the west end of the town before the east end and Stepney were infected, which was about the middle of July."—Vide Extracts from Boghurst's "Loimographia," Appendix, No. 1.

† Pepys says, under the date of July 18th:—"I was much troubled this day to hear at Westminster, how the officers do bury the dead in the open Tuttle-fields, pretending want of room elsewhere."—See his "Diary," vol. ii.

But the City itself began now to be visited too, I mean within the walls; but the number of people there was indeed extremely lessened by so great a multitude having been gone into the country; and even all this month of July they continued to flee, though not in such multitudes as formerly. In August, indeed, they fled in such a manner, that I began to think there would be really none but magistrates and servants left in the City.

As they fled now out of the City, so I should observe that the Court removed early, viz., in the month of June, and went to Oxford, where it pleased God to preserve them; and the Distemper did not, as I heard of, so much as touch them; for which I cannot say that I ever saw they showed any great token of thankfulness, and hardly anything of reformation, though they did not want being told that their crying vices might, without breach of charity, be said to have gone far in bringing that terrible judgment upon the whole nation.*

The face of London was now, indeed, strangely altered,

* There is a material error in the above paragraph. The Court left Whitehall on the 29th of June, but went no further than to Hampton Court, and remained there until the 27th of July following, when the King and Queen, as we learn from Pepys, "set out towards Salisbury." The Court, with some little intermission, continued in that city, until nearly the end of September, on the 28th of which month, the King arrived at Oxford, where, soon afterwards, he held a Parliament.

In the "News," No. 79, is the following paragraph:—"Lulworth Castle, in the Isle of Purbeck, September 18th.—His Majesty was yesterday at the Chapel in this Castle, to the exceeding comfort of all that had the honour to behold him: no impression at all of his late indisposition appearing in his countenance, but on the contrary, an ayre of perfect serenity and health." In the succeeding "Intelligencer," No. 80, is this notice—"Winton, September 23.—The removal of the Court from Salisbury to Oxford will leave this town thin, the High Court of Admiralty being already upon preparation for their removal too," &c. —"His Royal highness [the Duke of York] set forward early this morning towards Oxford...Ibid"

I mean the whole mass of buildings, City, Liberties, Suburbs, Westminster, Southwark, and altogether; for as to the particular part called the City, or within the walls, that was not yet much infected; but, in the whole, the face of things, I say, was much altered: sorrow and sadness sat upon every face; and though some parts were not yet overwhelmed, yet all looked deeply concerned; and as we saw it apparently coming on, so every one looked on himself and his family as in the utmost danger. Were it possible to represent those times exactly to those persons that did not see them, and to give them due ideas of the horror that everywhere presented itself, it must make just impressions upon their minds, and fill them with surprise. London might well be said to be all in tears; the mourners did not go about the streets, indeed, for nobody put on black, or made a formal dress of mourning for their nearest friends; but the voice of mourning was truly heard in the streets; the shrieks of women and children at the windows and doors of their houses, where their dearest relations were, perhaps, dying, or just dead, were so frequent to be heard, as we passed the streets, that it was enough to pierce the stoutest heart in the world to hear them. Tears and lamentations were seen in almost every house, especially in the first part of the visitation; for, towards the latter end, men's hearts were hardened, and Death was so always before their eyes, that they did not so much concern themselves for the loss of their friends, expecting that themselves should be summoned the next hour.

Business led me out sometimes to the other end of the town, even when the sickness was chiefly there; and as the thing was new to me, as well as to everybody else, it was a most surprising thing to see those streets, which were usually so thronged, now grown desolate;* and so few people to be seen in them, that if I had been a stranger, and at a loss for my way, I might sometimes have gone the length of a whole street, I mean of the by-streets, and seen nobody to direct me except watchmen, set at the doors of such houses as were shut up; of which I shall speak presently.

One day, being at that part of the town, on some special business, curiosity led me to observe things more than usually; and, indeed, I walked a great way where I had no business. I went up Holborn, and there the street was full of people; but they walked in the middle of the great street, neither on one side or the other, because, as I suppose, they would not mingle with anybody that came out of houses, or meet with smells and scents from houses that might be infected.

The Inns of Court were all shut up; nor were very many of the lawyers in the Temple, or Lincoln's-inn, or Gray's-inn, to be seen there.† Everybody was at peace;

* We learn from Pepys, that the desertion was so great, that St. James's Park was "quite locked up;" and under July 22nd, he writes:—"I by coach home, not meeting with but two coaches, and but two carts from White Hall to my own house, that I could observe, and the streets mighty thin of people."

† In consequence of the spreading of the Infection, the meetings of the Royal Society (which then assembled at Gresham College, in Broad Street) were agreed to be discontinued on the 28th of June, "until summoned by the President to meet again;" and most of the members retired into the country. The printing of the "Philosophical Transactions," of which five numbers had then been published, was also suspended till November. After the partial cessation of the sickness, the Council of the Royal Society reassembled at Gresham College on the 21st of February, 1665-6; when it was ordered "that the Fellows be summoned to attend on the 14th of March;" on which day the general weekly meetings were again commenced.

During the recess, Mr. Henry Oldenburgh, the secretary, thus spake of the Plague, in a letter, dated from the College, and addressed to the Honourable Robert Boyle, on the 8th of July, 1665:—"The sickness is not much spread as yet in the City, God be praised, though it be dangerously scattered. I cannot, from any information I can learn of

there was no occasion for lawyers: besides, it being in the time of the vacation too, they were generally gone into the country. Whole rows of houses in some places were shut close up, the inhabitants all fled, and only a watchman or two left.

When I speak of rows of houses being shut up, I do not mean shut up by the magistrates, but that great numbers of persons followed the Court, by the necessity of their employments, and other dependencies: and as others retired really frightened with the Distemper, it was a mere desolating of some of the streets. But the fright was not yet near so great in the City, abstractly so called; and particularly because, though they were at first in a most inexpressible consternation, yet, as I have observed, that the Distemper intermitted often at first, so they were, as it were, alarmed, and un-alarmed again, and this several times, till it began to be familiar to them; and that even when it appeared violent, yet seeing it did not presently spread into the City, or the east and south parts, the people began to take courage, and to be, as I may say, a little hardened. It is true a vast many people fled, as I have observed, yet they were chiefly from the west end of it, judge what its cause should be, but it seems to proceed only from infection or contagion, and that not caught, but from some near approach to some infected person or stuff; nor can I at all imagine it to be in the air; though yet there is one thing which is very differing from what is usual in other hot summers, and that is a very great scarcity of flies and insects. I know not whether it be universal, but it is here at London most manifest. I can hardly imagine, that there is a tenth part of what I have seen in other years."—Vide Boyle's "Works," vol. vi. p. 501: edit. 1772.

In respect to the scarcity of insects, thus noticed in the Plague year, the very reverse appears to have been the case in 1664.—"In the summer before the Plague," says Mr. Boghurst, "there was such a multitude of flies, that they lined the insides of houses, and if any thread or string did hang down in any place, it was presently thick ~~with~~ with flies, like a rope of onions; and such swarms of ants covered the highways, that you might have taken a handful at a time."—See Appendix, No. 1.

the town; and from that we call the heart of the City, that is to say, among the wealthiest of the people, and such people as were unencumbered with trades and business: but of the rest, the generality stayed, and seemed to abide the worst, so that in the place we call the liberties, and in the suburbs, in Southwark, and in the east part, such as Wapping, Ratcliff, Stepney, Rotherhithe, and the like, the people generally stayed, except here and there a few wealthy families who, as above, did not depend upon their business.

It must not be forgotten here, that the City and suburbs were prodigiously full of people at the time of this visitation, I mean at the time that it began; for though I have lived to see a farther increase, and mighty throngs of people settling in London, more than ever, yet we had always a notion that the numbers of people which, the wars being over, the armies disbanded, and the royal family and the monarchy being restored, had flocked to London, to settle in business, or to depend upon, and attend, the Court for rewards of services, preferments, and the like, was such, that the town was computed to have in it above a hundred thousand people more than ever it held before; nay, some took upon them to say it had twice as many, because all the ruined families of the royal party flocked hither; all the old soldiers set up trades here, and abundance of families settled here: again, the Court brought with them a great flux of pride and new fashions; all people were grown gay and luxurious; and the joy of the Restoration had brought a vast many families to London.

I often thought, that as Jerusalem was besieged by the Romans, when the Jews were assembled together to celebrate the Passover, by which means an incredible number of people were surprised there, who would otherwise have been in other countries,—so the Plague entered London, when an incredible increase of people had happened occasionally by the particular circumstances above named. As this conflux of the people to a youthful and gay Court made a great trade in the City, especially in everything that belonged to fashion and finery, so it drew, by consequence, a great number of workmen, manufacturers, and the like, being mostly poor people, who depended upon their labour; and I remember, in particular, that in a representation to my Lord Mayor of the condition of the poor, it was estimated, that there were no less than a hundred thousand riband-weavers in and about the City;* the chiefest number of whom lived then in the parishes of Shoreditch, Stepney, Whitechapel, and Bishopsgate; namely about Spittlefields; that is to say, as Spittlefields was then, for it was not so large as now by one-fifth part.

By this, however, the number of people in the whole may be judged of; and, indeed I often wondered that, after the prodigious numbers of people that went away at first, there was yet so great a multitude left as it appeared there was.

But I must go back again to the beginning of this surprising time:—while the fears of the people were young, they were increased strangely by several odd accidents, which, put altogether, it was really a wonder the whole body of the people did not rise as one man, and abandon their dwellings, leaving the place as a space of ground designed by Heaven for an Akelduma,* doomed to be destroyed from the face of the earth; and that all that would be found in it would perish with it. I shall name but a few of these things; but sure they were so many, and so many wizards and cunning people propagating them, that I have often wondered there were any (women especially) left behind.

In the first place, a blazing Star, or Comet, appeared for several months before the Plague; as there did the year after another, a little before the [Great] Fire. The old women, and the phlegmatic hypochondriac part of the other sex, whom I could almost call old women too, remarked (especially afterward, though not till both those Judgments were over) that those two Comets passed directly over the City, and that so very near the houses, that it was plain they imported something peculiar to the City alone: that the Comet before the Pestilence was of a faint, dull, languid colour, and its motion very heavy, solemn, and slow; but that the Comet before the Fire was bright and sparkling, or, as others said, flaming, and its motion swift and furious; and that, accordingly, one foretold a heavy Judgment, slow, but severe, terrible and frightful, as was the Plague; but the other foretold a stroke, sudden, swift, and fiery, as the Conflagration was; nay, so particular some people were, that as they looked upon that Comet preceding the Fire, they fancied that they not only saw it pass swiftly and fiercely, and could perceive the motion with their eye, but even [that] they heard it; that it made a rushing mighty noise, fierce and terrible, though at a distance, and but just perceivable.*

* Many notices of the above Comets occur in the 1st volume of the "Philosophical Transactions," as well as in the writings of different astronomers. That of 1664 was first seen in England about the 13th of December, and three several accounts of its appearance were read at a Meeting of the Royal Society on the 21st of that month. It was described as being "a very great Comet, appearing in the south-south-east, with a very long tail extending towards the north-west." Its line of motion is reported to have been first ascertained by Mons. Adrian Auzout, a French Mathematician, who exhibited an ephemeris of its predicted course, as deduced from his own observations: similar and according calculations were made by the celebrated Cassini. It came to its perihelion on the 4th December, but was occasionally observed even till the 8th of March following. Hevelius, in his "Prodromus Cometicus," calculated its diameter as being three times larger than that of the earth. The second Comet was noticed in England at the beginning of April, 1665; but it had been seen several weeks before that time on the Continent. Pepys, on April the 6th, thus mentions it in his "Diary:"—"Great talk of a new Comet, which it is certain does appear as bright as the late one at the best." Some observations made on it at Vienna, were read at a Meeting of the Royal Society on the 12th of April; on 24th of which month it came to its perihelion. Mons. Auzout, who began first to observe it on the 2nd of April (and to calculate the elements of its orbit), remarked, that the circumstances of this second Comet were contrary to those of the former in almost every particular. "The former Comet," he says, "moved very swift, but this latter rather slow:—that, contrary to the order of the signs, from east to west; but this following them from west to east:—that, from south to north; but this from north to south, so far as he observed:—that, on the side opposite to the sun, but this, on the same side:—that, in its perigee in the time of its opposition; this, out of the time of its conjunction." He observed, also, "that both the body and train of the latter Comet were much more bright and vivid than the former one."*

It is impossible not to trace, in the above remarks of Mons. Auzout, the very source and origin of De Foe's account of the respective characters of the two Comets; but here as on other occasions, for the purpose of heightening the interest of his relation, he has not scrupled to deviate from the exact truth, at least, in one instance; namely, that of assigning the apparently slow motion of the second Comet to the first of those bodies which appeared, and, which M. Auzout had described as the one that moved "very swift." His imaginary description, however, of the apparent motions of these Comets, connected as it is with the dire calamities of Plague and Fire which occurred so soon after their appearance, is drawn up with an almost appalling force. It is a vivid picture; it exhibits both the malignancy of the Pestilence, and the voracity and destructiveness of the Conflagration.

I saw both these Stars, and I must confess, had so much of the common notion of such things in my head, that I was apt to look upon them as the forerunners and warnings of God's judgments; and especially when, after the Plague had followed the first, I yet saw another of the like kind, I could not but say, God has not yet sufficiently scourged the City.

But I could not at the same time carry these things to the height that others did, knowing too, that natural

That the appearance of the Comets was associated with the belief that they were portents of misfortune and suffering is historically true. Burnet remarks ("History of his Own Times," vol. i., p. 218, edit. 1724), that "A great Comet, which appeared in the winter of 1664, raised the apprehensions of those, who did not enter into just speculations concerning those matters;"—and that the Plague, which breaking out in London so soon after, "swept away about an hundred thousand souls, and scattered all the inhabitants that were able to remove themselves elsewhere, did dishearten 'll people."

The "Intelligencer," No. 3, contains some observations on the first Comet or "Blazing Star," dated Tenbury, Worcestershire, January 2, 1664-5,—stating the apparent diameter of the Star to be not much above six digits, and that it had a blazing tail pointed N.E. by E., seeming to the eye about five or six feet long. In a letter from Venice, December 26, this Comet is said to have been seen "for a matter of a week, every morning from about one o'clock till two or three," half a foot in diameter, with a tail or stream issuing from it, of at least six yards in apparent length.

The portentous character of Comets seems to have been one of the most ancient and widely-prevailing among popular superstitions. Suetonius mentions a blazing Star, seen by the Romans shortly after the assassination of Julius Cæsar, and supposed to be connected with that event. William of Malmesbury says, that the Comet which appeared in 1060, was regarded a prognostic of the Norman Conquest. The notion that Comets portended plague, wars, and famine, is strongly advocated by Du Bartas, a French poet of the sixteenth century, whose poem on the "Divine Week and Works," was translated into English by Joshua Sylvester, in the reign of James the First. In all ages, indeed, the supposed malignancy of Cometary influences has excited alarm and terror; and been constantly the theme of deprecative aspirations. Its destructive agency has been thus specified by one of our elder poets:—

"And lo! portentous gleams the Blazing Star,
Threat'ning the world with Famine, Plague, and War:—
To Princes death; to Kingdoms many crosses;
To all Estates inevitable losses;
To Herdsmen rot; to Ploughmen hapless seasons;
To Sailors storms; to Cities civil treasours."

causes are assigned by the astronomers for such things; and that their motions, and even their revolutions, are calculated, or pretended to be calculated, so that they cannot be so perfectly called the forerunners, or foretellers, much less the procurers of such events, as pestilence, war, fire, and the like.

But let my thoughts, and the thoughts of the philosophers, be, or have been, what they will, these things had a more than ordinary influence upon the minds of the common people, and they had almost universal melancholy apprehensions of some dreadful calamity and judgment coming upon the City; and this principally from the sight of this Comet,* and of the alarm that was given in December by two people dying at St. Giles's, as above.

The apprehensions of the people were likewise strangely increased by the error of the times; in which, I think, the people, from what principle I cannot imagine, were more addicted to prophecies, and astrological conjurations, dreams, and old wives' tales, than ever they were before

* It would have been more correct to have said "these Comets," as it is evident, from the preceding note, that both were seen prior to any considerable extension of the Pestilence. Of the first Comet, of which De Foe is speaking, the subjoined notices occur in Pepys's "Diary." Under the date December 17th, 1664, he says, "Mighty talk there is of this Comet, that is seen a'nights, and the King and Queen did sit up last night to see it, and did, it seems; and to-night I thought to have done so too; but it is cloudy, and so no stars appear." On the 21st, he remarks, "My Lord Sandwich this day writes me word that he hath seen, at Portsmouth, the Comet, and says it is the most extraordinary thing he ever saw." Three days afterwards he made this entry:—"I saw the Comet, which is now, whether worn away or no I know not, but appears not with a tail, but only is larger and duller than any other star, and is come to rise betimes, and to make a great arch, and is gone quite to a new place in the heavens than it was in before." Under March 1st, 1664-5, he writes thus:—"To Gresham College, where Mr. Hooke read a second very curious lecture about the late Comet, amongst other things proving, very probably, that this is the very same Comet that appeared before, in the year 1618; and that in such a time probably, it will appear again, which is a very new opinion; but all will be in print."

or since. Whether this unhappy temper was originally raised by the follies of some people who got money by it, that is to say, by printing predictions and prognostications, I know not; but certain it is, books frightened them terribly; such as Lilly's Almanack, Gadbury's Astrological Predictions; Poor Robin's Almanack, and the like; also several pretended religious books; one entitled,—“Come out of her, my People, lest you be partaker of her Plagues;”—another called,—“Fair Warning;”—another,—“Britain's Remembrancer;” and many such; all, or most part of which, foretold, directly or covertly, the ruin of the City. Nay, some were so enthusiastically bold as to run about the streets, with their oral predictions, pretending they were sent to preach to the city; and one, in particular, who, like Jonah to Nineveh, cried in the streets—“Yet forty days and LONDON shall be destroyed:”—I will not be positive whether he said, “Yet, forty days,” or “Yet a few days.” Another ran about naked, except a pair of drawers about his waist, crying day and night, like a man that Josephus mentions, who cried, “Woe to Jerusalem!” a little before the destruction of that city;* so this poor naked creature cried,

* The occurrence alluded to by De Foe, is a very extraordinary one; and it will probably add to the interest of his own narrative to give it at length from the original authority. Among the omens which preceded the destruction of Jerusalem, by Titus, Josephus mentions,—A Comet, like a sword, which hung over the city a whole year; a light seen by night around the altar; the preternatural birth of a lamb from a cow; the spontaneous opening of the brazen gates of the Temple; chariots, and bands of armed men, appearing in the air; and a voice heard by night (in the Temple, on the day of Pentecost), as if of a multitude, exclaiming, ‘We will depart hence.’—“But,” says the historian, “what was more terrible than all, one Jesus, the son of Ananus, a mean rustic, four years before the commencement of the war, while the city was tranquil, and there was abundance of all things, when he came to the festival, during which it was the custom to place against the Temple tabernacles in honour of God, he began to cry aloud, ‘A voice from the East, a voice from the West, a voice from the four Winds; a voice against Jerusalem and the Temple, a voice against the bridegrooms’

“O the Great and the Dreadful God!” and said no more, but repeated those words continually, with a voice and countenance full of horror, a swift pace, and nobody could ever find him to stop, or rest, or take any sustenance, at least, that ever I could hear of. I met this poor creature several times in the streets, and would have spoken to him, but he would not enter into speech with me, or any one else, but held on his dismal cries continually.

These things terrified the people to the last degree; and especially when two or three times, as I have mentioned already, they found one or two in the bills, dead of the Plague at St. Giles’s.*

and brides, a voice against the whole people!’ Thus by night, at intervals exclaiming, he took his circuit through all the streets of the city. Some of the chiefs of the people, displeased at the ill omen, had the man seized and well punished with stripes. But he making no resistance, nor asking any mercy from his tormentors, continued his exclamations in the same words. At length the magistrates, conceiving that the man was divinely inspired, brought him before the Roman President; and his punishment being repeated till his flesh was torn from the bones, he neither shed tears, nor offered prayers; but, as well as he could, kept on crying out with a doleful and piteous voice, at each stroke of the whip, ‘Woe! woe! to Jerusalem!’ Albinus, who was then the Procurator of Judea, interrogating him—who he was?—whence he came?—and wherefore he said such things?—he made no answer whatever. Nor did he cease to bewail the fate of the city: so at length Albinus released him, concluding that he was deranged. He thus continued to the time of the war, not consorting with any of the citizens, nor was he ever seen to speak to any one; but every day, like a herald, he went about proclaiming, ‘Woe! woe! to Jerusalem!’ He entreated nobody, on the several days when he was beaten; and he thanked not those who gave him food; his sole response to all being the sad prognostication. He vociferated more especially at the festivals; and after he had done thus for seven years and five months, neither was his voice become hoarse, nor did he appear fatigued; until in the time of the siege, the appearance of what he had prophesied quieted him. For, walking on the walls, again, he cried with a loud voice, ‘Woe to the City! and Temple, and people!’ and when he came to the conclusion he added, ‘Woe, also, to Myself!’ Being that instant struck by a stone discharged from a Balista, he fell, uttering the ominous words with his last breath.”—Opera Josephi, edit. a Hudson, vol. ii. b. vi. ch. 5, sect. 3.

* St. Giles’s; St. Andrew’s, Holborn; and St. Clement’s Danes, were the Parishes most afflicted with the Plague, until the end of June, when it became very general in the out-parishes.

Next to these public things were the dreams of old women, or, I should say, the interpretation of old women upon other people's dreams; and these put abundance of people even out of their wits. Some heard voices warning them to be gone, for that there would be such a Plague in London so that the living would not be able to bury the dead; others saw apparitions in the air:—and I must be allowed to say of both, I hope without breach of charity, that they heard voices that never spake, and saw sights that never appeared: but the imagination of the people was really turned wayward and possessed; and no wonder if they who were poring continually at the clouds saw shapes and figures, representations and appearances, which had nothing in them but air and vapour. Here, they told us they saw a flaming sword held in a hand, coming out of a cloud, with a point hanging directly over the city. There, they saw hearses and coffins in the air, carrying to be buried. And there again, heaps of dead bodies lying unburied, and the like, just as the imagination of the poor terrified people furnished them with matter to work upon.

“So Hypochondriac fancies represent
Ships, Armies, Battles, in the firmament;
Till steady eyes the exhalations solve,
And all to its first matter, Cloud, resolve.”

I could fill this account with the strange relations such people gave every day, of what they had seen; and every one was so positive of their having seen what they pretended to see that there was no contradicting them without breach of friendship, or being accounted rude and unmannerly on the one hand, and profane and impenetrable on the other. One time, before the Plague was begun, (otherwise than, as I have said, in St. Giles's,) I think it was in March, seeing a crowd of people in the street, I joined them to satisfy my curiosity, and found them all staring up into the air, to see what a woman told them appeared plain to her, which was "an Angel clothed in white, with a fiery sword in his hand, waving it, or brandishing it over his head."* She described every part of the figure to the life; showed them the motion, and the form; and the poor people came into it so eagerly, and with so much readiness:—"Yes, I see it all plainly," says one; "there is the sword as plain as can be." Another saw the Angel. One saw his very face, and cried out, "What a glorious creature he was!" One saw one thing, and one another. I looked as earnestly as the rest, but perhaps not with so much willingness to be imposed upon, and I said, indeed, "That I could see nothing but a white cloud, bright on one side, by the shining of the sun upon the other part." The woman endeavoured to shew it me, but could not make me confess that I saw it, which, indeed, if I had, I must have * De Foe, who made little scruple of borrowing from the labours of his predecessors, may possibly have derived some of his aerial portents from Simon Goulart, an old French writer, who, amidst accounts of "Divers Apparitions in the Air," indicative of impending calamities, gives the following relation: "On the 29th of March, 1545, about eight o'clock in the morning, there fell in the neighbourhood of Cracow, a thunder-bolt, with a clap of thunder so violent as seemed to shake all Poland. Immediately there appeared in the heavens three red crosses, between which was a man completely armed, holding a flaming sword, and combating an army, which he defeated. Thereupon followed a horrible Dragon, which swallowed up the victorious combatant; and upon this the heavens opened, as if on fire, and was thus beheld for the space of a full hour. Next there appeared three Rainbows, with their accustomed colours, on the highest of which was the figure of an Angel, as usually represented, in the shape of a youth with wings at the shoulders; holding the Sun in one hand and the Moon in the other. This second spectacle having continued half an hour, in the presence of all who chose to look at it, some clouds then arose, which covered these apparitions." See "Histoires Admirables et Memorables de nostre Temps, recueillies, &c., par Simon Goulart. Paris, 1603, 12mo, fol. 42." Goulart seems to have derived this portion of his miscellany of blended fact and fiction from the treatise of Conrad Lycosthenes, "De Prodigis et Ostentis;" to which, indeed, he refers.

lied. But the woman turning upon me, looked in my face, and fancied I laughed: in which her imagination deceived her too; for I really did not laugh, but was very seriously reflecting how the poor people were terrified by the force of their own imagination. However, she turned from me, called me "profane fellow," and "a scoffer;" told me, "that it was a time of God's anger, and dreadful judgments were approaching; and that despisers, such as I, should wonder and perish."

The people about her seemed disgusted as well as she; and I found there was no persuading them that I did not laugh at them, and that I should be rather mobbed by them, than be able to undeceive them: so I left them; and this appearance passed for as real as the Blazing Star itself.

Another encounter I had, in the open day also; and this was in going through a narrow passage from Petty-France into Bishopsgate church-yard, by a row of alms-houses. There are two church-yards to Bishopsgate church, or parish; one we go over to pass from the place called Petty-France into Bishopsgate street, coming out just by the church door; the other is on the side of the narrow passage where the alms-houses are on the left; and a dwarf wall with a palisado on it, on the right hand; and the city wall on the other side, more to the right.

In this narrow passage stands [stood] a Man looking through between the palisadoes into the burying place; and as many people as the narrowness of the passage would admit to stop, without hindering the passing of others; and he was talking mighty eagerly to them, and pointing now to one place, and then to another, and affirming that he saw a Ghost walking upon such a gravestone there: he described the shape, the posture, and the movement of it so exactly, that it was the greatest matter of amazement to him in the world that everybody did not see it as well as he. On a sudden he would cry, "There it is—Now it comes this way;" then, "'Tis turned back:" till at length he persuaded the people into so firm a belief of it, that one fancied he saw it, and another fancied he saw it; and thus he came every day making a strange hubbub, considering it was in so narrow a passage, till Bishopsgate clock struck eleven; and then the Ghost would seem to start, and, as if he were called away, disappear on a sudden.

I looked earnestly every way, and at the very moment that this man directed, but could not see the least appearance of anything; but so positive was this poor man, that he gave the people the vapours in abundance, and sent them away trembling and frightened; till, at length, few people that knew of it, cared to go through that passage, and hardly anybody by night, on any account whatever.*

This Ghost, as the poor man affirmed, made sigus to the houses, and to the ground, and to the people; plainly intimating, or else they so understanding it, that abundance of the people should come to be buried in that church-yard; as, indeed, happened. But that he saw such aspects, I must acknowledge, I never believed; nor could I see anything of it myself, though I looked most earnestly to see it, if possible.

These things serve to show how far the people were really overcome with delusions; and as they had a notion of the approach of a visitation, all their predictions ran upon a most dreadful Plague, which should lay the whole City, and even the Kingdom, waste; and should destroy almost all the nation, both man and beast.

* However our common sense may be shocked at these bygone gross instances of credulity and superstition commixed, the triumph of modern discernment is not always so complete as may be imagined. It was only a very few years since, that our newspapers noticed the congregation of nightly crowds to see an apparition in the churchyard of Christchurch, Blackfriars Road!

To this, as I said before, the Astrologers added stories of the conjunctions of planets in a malignant manner, and with a mischievous influence; one of which conjunctions was to happen, and did happen, in October, and the other in November; and they filled the people's heads with predictions on these signs of the heavens, intimating, that those conjunctions foretold drought, famine, and pestilence.* In the first two of them, however, they were * In Lilly's "Astrological Predictions," published in 1648, is An Astrological Judgment of the Conjunction Saturn and Mars, wherein occurs the following remarkable passage; the full value of which the believers in Judicial Astrology will doubtless appreciate. "In the year 1656," says our author, "the Aphelium of Mars, who is the general Significator of England, will be in Virgo, which is assuredly the ascendant of the English Monarchy, but Aries of the Kingdom: when this Absis, therefore, of Mars shall appear in Virgo, who shall expect less than a strange Catastrophe of Human affairs in this Commonwealth, Monarchy, and Kingdom of England?—There will then, either in or about these times, or near that year, or within ten years more or lesse of that time, or within a little time after, appear in this Kingdom so strange a Revolution of State, so grand a Catastrophe and great mutation unto this monarchy and Government, as never yet appeared;—of which, as the times now stand, I have no liberty or encouragement to deliver my opinion: Only it will be ominous to LONDON, unto her Merchants at Sea, to her traffique at land, to her poor, to her rich, to all sorts of people inhabiting in her or her Liberties, by reason of sundry Fires and a consuming Plague," &c. See "Astro. Predic." p. 41.—The notable indecision with which Lilly has marked the time for the occurrence of these events, will not escape the attention of the intelligent reader.

Charles II. himself, is known not to have been free from astrological credulity. He had, also, been flattered into the belief, that he possessed the virtue of curing the King's Evil; and the following Advertisement on that subject appeared in the "Intelligencer" of April 24th, when the Court had begun to take alarm at the spreading of the Infection, viz.:—"This is to give notice, That his Majesty has declared his positive resolution not to heal any more after the end of this present April until Michaelmas next. And this is published to the end that all persons concerned may take notice thereof, and not receive a disappointment." Similar announcements were issued in the two following years, namely, —that the King would "not touch for the Evil, till the heats were over."

entirely mistaken, for we had no drougthy season, but in the beginning of the year a hard frost, which lasted from December almost to March; and after that, moderate weather, rather warm than hot, with refreshing winds, and, in short, very seasonable weather; and also several very great rains.*

Some endeavours were used to suppress the printing of such books as terrified the people, and to frighten the dispersers of them, some of whom were taken up, but nothing [farther] was done in it, as I am informed; the Government being unwilling to exasperate the people, who were, as I may say, all out of their wits already.

Neither can I acquit those ministers that, in their sermons, rather sunk than lifted up the hearts of their hearers: many of them, no doubt, did it for the strengthening the resolution of the people, and especially for quickening them to repentance; but it certainly answered not their end, at least not in proportion to the injury it did another way; and, indeed, as God himself, through the whole Scriptures, rather draws to him by invitations, and calls to turn to him and live, than drives us by terror and amazements; so, I must confess, I thought the ministers should have done also, imitating our blessed Lord and Master in this, that his whole gospel is full of declarations from heaven of God's mercy, and his readiness to receive penitents, and forgive them; complaining, “Ye will not come unto me, that ye may have life;” and that, therefore, his gospel is called the gospel of peace, and the gospel of grace.

* In this De Foe is incorrect.—Dr. Baynard, an eminent physician of that day, has remarked in his "Observations on the Seasons," &c., that "there was such a general calm and serenity of weather, as if both wind and rain had been expelled the kingdom;" and that "for many weeks together he could not discover the least breath of wind, not even so much as to move a fane; and the fires in the streets with great difficulty were made to burn, through the great scarcity of nitre [oxygen?] in the air; and by the extreme rarefaction thereof the birds did pant for breath, especially those of the larger sort, who were likewise observed to fly more heavily than usual."—See, also, "Appendix," No. I.

But we had some good men, and that of all persuasions and opinions, whose discourses were full of terror; who spoke nothing but dismal things, and, as they brought the people together with a kind of horror, sent them away in tears, prophesying nothing but evil tidings; terrifying the people with the apprehensions of being utterly destroyed, not guiding them, at least not enough, to cry to Heaven for mercy.

It was, indeed, a time of very unhappy breaches among us in matters of religion. Innumerable sects, and divisions, and separate opinions, prevailed among the people; the Church of England was restored, indeed, with the restoration of the monarchy, about four years before; but the ministers and preachers of the Presbyterians, and Independents, and of all the other sorts of professions, had begun to gather separate societies, and erect altar against altar, and all those had their meetings for worship apart, as they have now, but not so many then, the Dissenters being not thoroughly formed into a body as they are since; and those congregations which were thus gathered together were yet but few; and even those that were, the Government did not allow, but endeavoured to suppress them, and shut up their meetings.

But the Visitation reconciled them again, at least for a time, and many of the best and most valuable ministers and preachers of the Dissenters were suffered to go into the churches where the incumbents were fled away, as many were, not being able to stand it; and the people flocked without distinction to hear them preach, not much inquiring who, or what opinion they were of; but after the sickness was over, that spirit of charity abated, and every church being again supplied with its own ministers, or others presented, where the minister was dead, things returned to their old channel again.*

One mischief always introduces another. These terrors and apprehensions of the people led them into a thousand weak, foolish, and wicked things, which there wanted not a sort of people, really wicked, to encourage them to; and this was running about to fortunetellers, cunning men, and astrologers, to know their fortune, or, as it is vulgarly expressed, to have their fortunes told them, their nativities calculated and the like; and this folly presently made the town swarm with a wicked generation of Pretenders to Magic, to the Black Art, as they called it, and I know not what; nay, to a thousand worse dealings with the Devil than they were really guilty of; and this trade grew so open, and was so generally practised, that it became common to have signs and inscriptions set up at doors;—"Here lives a Fortuneteller,"—"Here lives an Astrologer,"—"Here you may have your Nativity cal-

* We derive the following information from the Rev. Thos. Vincent's remarkable tract, intituled "God's Terrible Voice in the City."—The Citizens, when under the dreadful and deplorable circumstances to which the Plague had reduced them, and in the greatest want of Spiritual Guides, were forsaken by their Parochial Ministers; and the people, crowding into eternity (bemoaning the want of spiritual assistance), the Non-conformist Ministers, considering their great obligations to God, and indispensable duty in this dreadful Visitation to their fellow-citizens, were induced, though contrary to Law, to repair to the deserted Church-pulpits; whither the people, without distinction of Church and Dissenters, joyfully resorted. The concourse, on those occasions, was so exceedingly great, that the Ministers were frequently obliged to clamber over the pews to get at the pulpits, and if ever preaching had a better effect than ordinary, it was at this time; for the people did as "eagerly catch at the Word as a drowning man at a rope," and with the same fervour as if their eternal happiness had thereon depended.—Mr. Vincent was a Non-conformist Minister, and of some note in his day; he was one of those ministers that weathered the pestilential storm.

culated,"—and the like ; and Friar Bacon's Brazen Head, which was the usual sign of these people's dwellings, was to be seen almost in every street, or else the sign of Mother Shipton, or of Merlin's head, and the like.*

With what blind, absurd, and ridiculous stuff, these Oracles of the Devil pleased and satisfied the people I really know not ; but certain it is, that innumerable attendants crowded about their doors every day ; and if but a grave fellow in a velvet jacket, a band, and a black cloak, which was the habit those quack conjurors generally went in, was but seen in the streets, the people would follow them in crowds, and ask them questions as they went along.

I need not mention what a horrid delusion this was, or what it tended to ; but there was no remedy for it till the Plague itself put an end to it all, and I supposed cleared

* "Amongst natural causes," says Dr. Hodges (in his "Letter to a Person of Quality,") "the conjunctions of some Planets, Eclipses, Comets, and such like appearances in the Heavens, are by many accused as the authors of the Plague ; and upon this account, some addicted to Astrology, observing such appearances the foregoing years, have confidently asserted that our Pest was the issue of those malevolent influences."

Dryden thus alludes to the malignant influence of the Comets, in his "Annus Mirabilis," verse 291:—

"The utmost malice of the stars is past,
And two dire Comets which have scourged the town
In their own Plague and Fire have breathed their last,
Or dimly in their sinking sockets frown."

In the same poem (verses 267, 268) he thus speaks of the Infection, in the Supplication which King Charles is supposed to address to the Almighty, to stay the progress of the Conflagration:—

"O let it be enough what thou hast done ;
When spotted deaths ran armed through every street,
With poisoned darts, which not the good could shun,
The speedy could out-fly, or valiant meet.

"The living few, and frequent funerals then,
Proclaimed thy wrath on this fersaken place ;
And now those few, who are returned again,
Thy searching judgments to their dwellings trace."

the town of most of those calculators themselves. One mischief was, that if the poor people asked these mock astrologers whether there would be a Plague, or no? they all agreed in the general to answer "Yes;" for that kept up their trade: and had the people not been kept in a fright about that, the wizards would presently have been rendered useless, and their craft had been at an end. But they always talked to them "of such and such influences of the stars, of the conjunctions of such and such planets, which must necessarily bring sickness and distempers, and consequently the Plague;" and some had the assurance to tell them, the Plague was begun already, which was too true, though they that said so knew nothing of the matter.

The ministers, to do them justice, and preachers of most sorts, that were serious and understanding persons, thundered against these and other wicked practices, and exposed the folly as well as the wickedness of them together; and the most sober and judicious people despised and abhorred them. But it was impossible to make any impression upon the middling people, and the working labouring poor; their fears were predominant over all their passions, and they threw away their money in a most distracted manner upon those whimsies. Maid-servants especially, and men-servants, were the chief of their customers; and their question generally was, after the first demand of "Will there be a Plague?"—I say the next question was, "Oh, Sir! for the Lord's sake what will become of me? Will my mistress keep me, or will she turn me off? Will she stay here, or will she go into the country? And if she goes into the country, will she take me with her, or leave me here to be starved and undone?" And the like of men-servants.

The truth is, the case of poor servants was very dismal, as I shall have occasion to mention again by-and-by; for it was apparent, a prodigious number of them would be turned away, and it was so; and of them abundance perished; and particularly of those that these false prophets had flattered with hopes that they should be continued in their services, and carried with their masters and mistresses into the country: and had not public charity provided for these poor creatures, whose number was exceeding great,—and in all cases of this nature it must be so,—they would have been in the worst condition of any people in the city.

These things agitated the minds of the common people for many months, while the first apprehensions were upon them, and while the Plague was not, as I may say, yet broken out. But I must also not forget that the most serious part of the inhabitants behaved after another manner. The Government encouraged their devotion, and appointed public prayers, and days of fasting and humiliation, to make public confession of sin, and implore the mercy of God to avert the dreadful judgment which hung over their heads; and it is not to be expressed with what alacrity the people of all persuasions embraced the occasion; how they flocked to the churches and meetings, and they were all so thronged that there was often no coming near, no, not to the very doors of the largest churches. Also, there were daily prayers appointed morning and evening at several churches, and days of private praying at other places; at all which the people attended, I say, with an uncommon devotion. Several private families also, as well of one opinion as another, kept family fasts, to which they admitted their near relations only; so that, in a word, those people who were really serious and religious applied themselves in a truly Christian manner to the proper work of repentance and humiliation, as a Christian people ought to do.

Again, the public showed that they would bear their share in these things. The very Court, which was then gay and luxurious, put on a face of just concern for the public danger.* All the plays and interludes which, after the manner of the French court, had been set up, and began to increase among us, were forbidden to be acted; the gaming tables, public dancing-rooms, and music-houses, which had multiplied, and began to debauch the manners of the people, were shut up and suppressed; and the jack-puddings, merry-andrews, puppet-shows, rope-dancers, and such like doings, which had bewitched the poor common people, shut up their shops, finding, indeed, no trade, for the minds of the people were agitated with other things; and a kind of sadness and horror at these things sat upon the countenances even of the common people. Death was before their eyes, and everybody began to think of their graves, not of mirth and diversions. But even those wholesome reflections,—which, rightly managed, would have most happily led the people to fall upon their knees, make confession of their sins, and look up to their merciful Saviour for pardon, imploring his compassion on them in such a time of their distress, by which we might have become as a second Nineveh,—had quite a contrary effect on the common people: who, ignorant and stupid in their reflections, as they were brutishly wicked and thoughtless before, were * Pepys gives many instances of the reckless profligacy which the Court exhibited, as well in the years immediately preceding the Plague, as after its cessation.—In April, 1665, he mentions, that the Noon-hall, within Whitehall, “was now turned to a house of Playing.”—Diary, vol. ii.

now led by their fright to extremes of folly; and as I have said before, they ran to conjurors and witches, and all sorts of deceivers, to know what should become of them; who fed their fears, and kept them always alarmed and awake, on purpose to delude them, and pick their pockets. So, they were as mad upon running after quacks and mountebanks, and every practising old woman, for medicines and remedies; storing themselves with such multitudes of pills, potions, and preservatives, as they were called, that they not only spent their money, but even poisoned themselves beforehand, for fear of the poison of the infection, and prepared their bodies for the Plague, instead of preserving them against it. On the other hand, it is incredible, and scarce to be imagined, how the posts of houses and corners of streets were plastered over with doctors bills, and papers of ignorant fellows quacking and tampering in physick, inviting the people to come to them for remedies; which [invitation] was generally set off with such flourishes as these, viz. :—INFALLIBLE PREVENTIVE PILLS against the Plague,—NEVER-FAILING PRESERVATIVES against the infection,—SOVEREIGN CORDIALS against the corruption of the air,—EXACT REGULATIONS for the conduct of the body in case of an infection,—ANTI-PESTILENTIAL PILLS,—INCOMPARABLE DRINK against the Plague, never found out before,—AN UNIVERSAL REMEDY for the Plague, — The ONLY TRUE PLAGUE WATER,*—The ROYAL ANTIDOTE against all kinds of infection; and such a number more that I cannot reckon up: and if * Pepys says, under the date of July 19: "Walked to Redriffe, where I hear the sickness is, and, indeed, it is scattered almost everywhere. My Lady Carteret did this day give me a bottle of Plague Water home with me."—Diary.

I could, it would fill a book of themselves to set them down.

Others set up bills to summon people to their lodgings for directions and advice in the case of infection: these had specious titles also, such as these:—

An eminent High-Dutch Physician, newly come over from Holland, where he resided during all the time of the great Plague, last year, in Amsterdam, and cured multitudes of people that actually had the Plague upon them.

An Italian Gentlewoman, just arrived from Naples, having a choice Secret to prevent Infection, which she found out by her great experience, and did wonderful cures with it in the late Plague there, wherein there died 20,000 in one day.

An ancient Gentlewoman having practised with great success in the late Plague in this city, Anno 1636, gives her Advice only to the Female sex. To be spoken with, &c.

An experienced Physician, who has long studied the Doctrine of Antidotes against all sorts of poison and infection, has, after forty years' practice, arrived to such skill as may, with God's blessing, direct Persons how to prevent their being touched by any contagious distemper whatsoever. He directs the Poor gratis.

I take notice of these by way of specimen. I could give you two or three dozen of the like, and yet have abundance left behind. 'Tis sufficient from these to apprise any one of the humour of those times; and how a set of thieves and pick-pockets not only robbed and cheated the poor people of their money, but poisoned their bodies with odious and fatal preparations; some with mercury, and some with other things as bad, perfectly remote from the thing pretended to; and rather hurtful than serviceable to the body, in case an infection followed.*

* It may not be unacceptable to the reader to see a few other examples of the quack advertisements of that period:—for instance, in the "Newes," Nos. 38 and 42 (May the 18th and June the 15th) were the following:—

Constantine Rhodocanaceis, Grecian, hath, at a small price, that admirable preservative against the Plague, wherewith Hippocrates, the Prince of all Physicians, preserved the whole land of Greece, &c., &c. To be had in London, next door to the Three Kings Inn, in Southampton Buildings, near the King's Gate in Holborn.

I cannot omit a subtlety of one of those quack operators, with which he gulled the poor people to crowd about him, but did nothing for them without money. He had, it seems, added to his bills which he gave about the streets, this advertisement in capital letters, viz.—HE GIVES ADVICE TO THE POOR FOR NOTHING.

Abundance of poor people came to him accordingly, to whom he made a great many fine speeches, examined them of the state of their health, and of the constitution of their bodies, and told them many good things for them to do, which were of no great moment: but the issue and conclusion of all was, that he had a preparation which, if they took such a quantity of, every morning, he would pawn his life they should never have the Plague,—no, though they lived in the house with people that were infected. This made the people all resolve to have it; but then the price of that was so much, I think 'twas half a crown. “But, sir,” says one poor woman, “I am

One Dr. Stephanus Chrysolitus, a famous physician, lately arrived in these parts, having travelled in several countries infected with the Plague, hath found by experience to be very beneficial (by the blessing of God) for preventing the infection thereof, to eat Raisins of the Sun in the morning fasting, and Malaga Raisins, either baked or boiled: and this he hath published for the Public good.

In the “Intelligencer,” No. 49 (June 24th), A preparation called Spiritus Antiloimoides, or an antidote against the Plague, was advertised as selling at Amen Corner, under the authority of the College of Physicians.

In the “Necessary Directions” (cited before) issued by the College of Physicians in 1665, the following is announced as “The Plague-water of Mathius or Aqua Epidemica,” namely:—“Take the roots of Tormentil, Angelica, Peony, Zedoarie, Liquorish, Elecampane, of each half an ounce, the leaves of Sage, Scordium, Celandine, Rue, Rosemary, Wormwood, Ros Solis, Mugwort, Burnet, Dragons, Scabious, Agrimony, Baum, Carduus, Betony, Centery the less, Marygold's leaves and flowers, of each one handful: Let them all be cut, bruised, and infused three days in eight pints of White-wine, in the month of May, and distilled.”

a poor alms-woman, and am kept by the parish, and your bills say, you give the poor your help for nothing." "Ay, good woman," says the doctor, "so I do, as I published there: I give my advice to the poor for nothing, but not my physic!" "Alas, sir," says she, "that is a snare laid for the poor then; for you give them your advice for nothing, that is to say, you advise them gratis, to buy your physic for their money, so does every shopkeeper with his wares." Here the woman began to give him ill words, and stood at his door all that day, telling her tale to all the people that came, till the doctor, finding she turned away his customers, was obliged to call her up stairs again, and give her his box of physic for nothing,—which, perhaps too, was good for nothing when she had it.

But to return to the people, whose confusions fitted them to be imposed upon by all sorts of pretenders, and by every mountebank. There is no doubt but these quacking sorts of fellows raised great gains out of the miserable people; for we daily found the crowds that ran after them were infinitely greater, and their doors were more thronged than those of Dr. Brooks, Dr. Upton, Dr. Hodges, Dr. Berwick, or any, though the most famous men of the time; and I was told that some of them got five pounds a day by their physic.*

But there was still another madness beyond all this, which may serve to give an idea of the distracted humour of the poor people at that time; and this was their following a worse sort of deceivers than any of the above;

* One of the boldest attempts to profit by the credulity of the public during the occurrence of the Plague, was made by James Angier, Esq., who seems to have actually obtained the sanction of the Government in support of a scheme for Disinfecting Houses, said to have been tried at Paris, Lyons, Toulouse, and in other cities. See advertisement alleged to be published by order of Lord Arlington, Principal Secretary of State, in the "Newes," No. 50.

for these petty thieves only deluded them to pick their pockets, and get their money, in which their wickedness, whatever it was, lay chiefly on the side of the deceiver's deceiving, not upon the deceived :—but in this part I am going to mention, it lay chiefly in the people deceived, or equally in both ; and this was in wearing charms, philters, exorcisms, amulets, and I know not what preparations, to fortify the body with them against the Plague ; as if the Plague was not the Hand of God, but a kind of possession of an Evil Spirit ; and that it was to be kept off with crossings, signs of the zodiac, papers tied up with so many knots, and certain words or figures written on them, as particularly the word ABRACADABRA,* formed in triangle, or pyramid, thus :—

* This mysterious word which, written as above, was regarded as a talisman, or charm, of wonderful power, is said to have been the name of a Syrian god ; whose aid was considered to be invoked by the wearers of the amulet. It originated in the superstitions of a very remote period, and was recommended as an antidote by Serenus Samonicus, a Roman Physician, who lived in the early part of the third century, in the reigns of the emperors Severus and Caracalla. Its efficacy was reputed to be most powerful in agues and other disorders of a febrile kind, and particularly against the fever called by the physicians Hemitritæus.

in a time of such danger, in a matter of such consequences as this of a National Infection. But my memorandums of these things relate rather to take notice only of the fact, and mention only that it was so. How the poor people found the insufficiency of those things, and how many of them were afterwards carried away in the dead-carts, and thrown into the common graves of every parish, with these hellish charms and trumpery hanging about their necks, remains to be spoken of as we go along.

All this was the effect of the hurry the people were in, after the first notion of the Plague being at hand was among them; and which may be said to be from about Michaelmas, 1664, but more particularly after the two men died in St. Giles's, in the beginning of December; and again, after another alarm, in February: for when the Plague evidently spread itself, they soon began to see the folly of trusting to those unperforming creatures, who had gulled them of their money; and then their fears worked another way, namely, to amazement and stupidity, not knowing what course to take, nor what to do, either to help or relieve themselves; but they ran about from one neighbour's house to another, and even in the streets from one door to another, with repeated cries of, "Lord have mercy upon us, what shall we do?"

Indeed the poor people were to be pitied in one particular thing, in which they had little or no relief, and which I desire to mention with a serious awe and reflection, which, perhaps, every one that reads this may not relish; namely, that whereas Death now began not, as we may say, to hover over every one's head only, but to look into their houses and chambers, and stare in their faces; though there might be some stupidity and dulness of the mind, and there was so, a great deal; yet there was a great deal of just alarm, sounded in the very inmost soul, if I may so say, of others. Many consciences were awakened; many hard hearts melted into tears; and many a penitent confession was made of crimes long concealed. It would have wounded the soul of any Christian to have heard the dying groans of many a despairing creature; and none durst come near to comfort them. Many a robbery, many a murder, was then confessed aloud, and nobody surviving to record the accounts of it. People might be heard, even in the streets as we passed along, calling upon God for mercy, through Jesus Christ, and saying, "I have been a thief,—I have been an adulterer,—I have been a murderer,"—and the like; and none durst stop to make the least inquiry into such things, or to administer comfort to the poor creatures, that in the anguish both of soul and body thus cried out. Some of ministers did visit the sick at first, and for a little while, but it was not to be done; it would have been present Death to have gone into some houses. The very buryers of the dead, who were the most hardened creatures in town, were sometimes beaten back, and so terrified that they durst not go into the houses where whole families were swept away together, and where the circumstances were more particularly horrible, as some were; but this was, indeed, at the first heat of the distemper.

Time inured them to it all; and they ventured everywhere afterwards without hesitation, as I shall have occasion to mention at large hereafter.

I am supposing now the Plague to be begun, as I have said, and that the Magistrates began to take the condition of the people into their serious consideration. What they did as to the regulation of inhabitants and of infected families, I shall speak to by itself; but as to the affair of health, it is proper to mention it here; that having seen the foolish humour of the people in running after quacks and mountebanks, wizards, and fortune-tellers (which they did as above, even to madness), the Lord Mayor, a very sober and religious gentleman, appointed Physicians and Surgeons for relief of the poor; I mean, the diseased poor;* and, in particular, ordered the College of Physicians to public directions for cheap remedies for the poor, in all circumstances of the distemper.† This, indeed, was one of the most charitable and judicious things that could be done at that time; for this drove the people from haunting the doors of every disperser of bills; and from taking down blindly, and without consideration, Poison for Physic, and Death instead of Life.

This Direction of the Physicians was done by a consultation of the whole College; and, as it was particularly calculated for the use of the poor, and for cheap medicines, it was made public, so that everybody might see it; and copies were given gratis to all that desired it. But as it is public, and to be seen on all occasions, I need not give the reader of this the trouble of it.

I shall not be supposed to lessen the authority or capa-

* The Lord Mayor here spoken of was Sir JOHN LAWRENCE, whom Pope has eulogised, and whom the impressive language of Darwin has characterised as one who,

“ When Contagion, with mephitic breath,
And withered Famine urged the work of Death,
 With food and faith, with medicine and with prayer,
 Raised the weak head, and stayed the parting sigh,
 Or with new life relumed the swimming eye.”

LOVES OF THE PLANTS, Canto II.

† This is erroneous. The remedies suggested by the College of Physicians were drawn up (as stated in a previous note, p. 12) under the orders of a Committee of Privy Council. A copy of the “Directions” issued by the College, will be found in a “Collection of Scarce Pieces relating to the Plague,” 8vo, 1721.

city of the Physicians when I say that the violence of the Distemper, when it came to its extremity, was like the fire the next year. The fire which consumed what the Plague could not touch, defied all the application of remedies; the fire-engines were broken, the buckets thrown away, and the power of man was baffled and brought to an end: so the Plague defied all medicines; the very Physicians were seized with it, with their preservatives in their mouths; and men went about prescribing to others, and telling them what to do, till the tokens were upon them, and they dropped down dead, destroyed by that very enemy they directed others to oppose. This was the case of several Physicians, even some of them the most eminent,* and of several of the most skilful surgeons.

* Dr. Hodges states, that there wanted not the help of very great and worthy persons who voluntarily contributed their assistance in the dangerous work of restraining the progress of the infection; and he enumerates the learned Dr. Gibson, Regius Professor at Cambridge; Dr. Francis Glisson; Dr. Nathaniel Paget; Dr. Peter Berwick; Dr. Humphrey Brookes, &c. Of those persons, he remarks, eight or nine fell in the attempt, among whom was Dr. Wm. Conyers, to whose goodness and humanity he bears the most honourable testimony.

Among the other Physicians who suffered from the Plague, was Dr. Burnet, of Fenchurch Street. His dwelling was one of the first within the walls which was visited by the Infection. Pepys, under date of June 10th, thus mentions it: "In the evening home to supper, and there, to my great trouble, hear that the Plague is come into the City (though it hath these three or four weeks, since its beginning, been wholly out of the City); but where should it begin but in my good friend and neighbour's, Dr. Burnet's house, in Fenchurch Street, which in both points troubles me mightily." On the following day he wrote:—"I saw poor Dr. Burnet's door shut: but he hath, I hear, gained great goodwill among his neighbours; for he discovered it himself first, and caused himself to be shut up of his own accord: which was very handsome."

The goodwill here spoken of was, unhappily, but of short continuance; for a rumour became current that the Doctor had killed his servant, and he therefore found it necessary to vindicate his character by a public notice, or placard, at the Royal Exchange; a copy of which is here given from the "Intelligencer," No. 55, together with some introductory remarks by the editor, Sir Roger L'Estrange.

"I think it but an honest and necessary office," says the knight, "to make some mention of Dr. Burnet, M.D., whose house it has pleased Almighty God to visit with the Plague; and of that disease one of his Abundance of quacks too died, who had the folly to trust to their own medicines which, they must needs be conscious to themselves, were good for nothing; and who rather ought, like other sorts of thieves, to have ran away, sensible of their guilt, from the justice that they could not but expect should punish them, as they knew they had deserved.

Not that it is any derogation from the labour, or application of the Physicians, to say they fell in the common calamity: nor is it so intended by me; it rather is to their praise, that they ventured their lives so far as even to lose them in the service of mankind. They endeavoured to do good, and to save the lives of others; but we were not to expect that the Physicians could stop God's Judgments, or prevent a distemper, eminently armed from Heaven, from executing the errand it was sent about.

Doubtless, the Physicians assisted many by their skill, and by their prudence and applications, to the saving of servants died: whereupon a most unchristian and scandalous report was raised, that the said Doctor had murthered his man; without any other ground in the world than the malice of the first contriver. But I find that yesterday this unhappy gentleman caused to be fixed upon the Royal Exchange, London, his own vindication, in these very words following:—

“Whereas some person or persons have maliciously forged and published that abominable falsehood, viz., that I, Alex. Burnet, of St. Gabriel Fenchurch, London, Dr. in Physic, did kill my servant, William Passon, and was committed to Newgate for it,—I do, by these presents, upon the Royal Exchange, London, post him or them for forgery who have invented and vented that wicked report: It being declared under the hand and seal of Mr. Nath, Upton, Master of the Pesthouse, London, who searched the body of the said Wm. Passon, that he dyed of the Plague, and had a pestilential Bubo in his right groin and two blains in his right thigh.—July 14, 1665.—Alex. Burnet, M.D.’”

We may hope that this sufficed to arrest the calumny, and restore to the Doctor his good name. But alas! his days were already numbered, and neither detraction nor praise was of long avail. “This day,” says Pepys, under the date of August 25th, “I am told that Dr. Burnet, my Physician, is this morning dead of the Plague; which is strange, his man dying so long ago, and his house this month open again. Now himself dead! Poor unfortunate man!”

their lives, and restoring their health ; but it is not lessening their character, or their skill, to say, they could not cure those that had the tokens upon them, or those who were mortally infected before the Physicians were sent for, as was frequently the case.

It remains to mention now what public measures were taken by the Magistrates for the general safety, and to prevent the spreading of the distemper when it first broke out. I shall have frequent occasion to speak of the prudence of the Magistrates, their charity, their vigilance for the poor, and for preserving good order, furnishing provisions, and the like, when the Plague was increased, as it afterwards was. But I am now upon the Order and Regulations they published for the government of infected families.

I mentioned above, shutting of houses up ; and it is needful to say something particularly to that ; for this part of the history of the Plague is very melancholy ; but the most grievous story must be told.

About June, the Lord Mayor of London, and the court of Aldermen, as I have said, began more particularly to concern themselves for the regulation of the City.

The Justices of Peace for Middlesex, by direction of the Secretary of State, had begun to shut up houses in the parishes of St. Giles in the Fields, St. Martin, St. Clement Danes, &c., and it was with good success ; for in several streets where the Plague broke out, upon strict guarding the houses that were infected, and taking care to bury those that died immediately after they were known to be dead, the Plague ceased in those streets. It was also observed, that the Plague decreased sooner in those parishes, than it did in the parishes of Bishopsgate, Shoreditch, Aldgate, Whitechapel, Stepney, and others ;

the early care taken in that manner being a great means to the putting a check to it.

This shutting up of houses was a method first taken, as I understand, in the Plague which happened in 1603, at the coming of King James the First to the crown, and the power of shutting people up in their own houses was granted by Act of Parliament, entitled,—“An Act for the charitable Relief and Ordering of Persons infected with the Plague.” On which Act of Parliament, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the City of London, founded the Orders they made at this time, and which took place the first of July, 1665, when the numbers infected within the City were but few, the last Bill for the ninety-seven parishes being but four;—and some houses having been shut up in the City, and some people being removed to the Pest-house beyond Bunhill-fields, in the way to Islington;* I say, by these means, when there died near one thousand a-week in the whole, the number in the City was but twenty-eight; and the City was preserved more healthy in proportion, than any other place, all the time of the Infection.

These Orders of my Lord Mayor's were published the latter end of June, and took place from the first of July, and were as follow, viz. :—

ORDERS conceived and published by the LORD MAYOR and ALDERMEN of the CITY OF LONDON, concerning the Infection of the Plague, 1665.

“Whereas in the Reign of our late Sovereign, King James, of happy memory, an Act was made for the charitable Relief and ordering of persons infected with the Plague: whereby authority was given to Justices of the Peace, Mayors, Bailiffs, and other head officers, to appoint within their several limits, Examiners, Searchers, Watchmen, Keepers, and Buriers, for the persons and places infected, and to minister unto them oaths for the performance of their offices. And the same Statute did also authorize the giving of other directions, as unto them for the present necessity should seem good in their discretions. It is now, upon special consideration, thought very expedient for preventing and avoiding of infection of sickness (if it shall so please Almighty God), that these officers following be appointed, and these orders hereafter duly observed."

* This Pest-house was situated on the spot now called Pest-house row (which was built about the year 1737), near the west end of St. Luke's Hospital, in Old Street. It belonged to the City, and included many tenements.

Examiners to be appointed in Every Parish.

"First, it is thought requisite, and so ordered, that in every parish there be one, two, or more persons of good sort and credit, chosen and appointed by the Alderman, his Deputy, and Common Council of every ward, by the name of Examiners, to continue in that office the space of two months at least; and if any fit person, so appointed, shall refuse to undertake the same, the said parties so refusing, to be committed to prison until they shall conform themselves accordingly."

The Examiner's Office.

"That these Examiners be sworn by the Aldermen, to inquire and learn from time to time what houses in every parish be visited, and what persons be sick, and of what diseases, as near as they can inform themselves; and upon doubt in that case, to command restraint of access, until it appear what the disease shall prove: and if they find any person sick of the infection, to give order to the Constable that the house be shut up; and if the Constable shall be found remiss or negligent, to give present notice thereof to the Alderman of the Ward."

Watchmen.

"That to every infected house there be appointed two Watchmen; one for every day, and the other for the night; and that these Watchmen have a special care that no person go in or out of such infected houses, whereof they have the charge, upon pain of severe punishment. And the said Watchmen to do such further offices as the sick house shall need and require: and if the Watchman be sent upon any business, to lock up the house, and take the key with him; and the Watchman by day to attend until ten of the clock at night; and the Watchman by night until six in the morning."

Searchers.

"That there be a special care to appoint Women-searchers in every parish, such as are of honest reputation, and of the best sort as can be got in this kind: and these to be sworn to make due search and true report to the utmost of their knowledge, whether the persons whose bodies they are appointed to search, do die of the infection, or of what other diseases, as near as they can. And that the Physicians, who shall be appointed for cure and prevention of the infection, do call before them the said Searchers, who are or shall be appointed for the several parishes under their respective cares, to the end they may consider whether they are fitly qualified for that employment; and change them from time to time, as they shall see cause, if they appear defective in their duties.

“That no Searcher, during this time of Visitation, be permitted to use any public work or employment, or keep any shop or stall, or be employed as a laundress, or in any other common employment whatsoever.”

Chirurgeons.

“For better assistance of the Searchers, for as much as there hath been heretofore great abuse in mis-reporting the disease, to the further spreading of the infection; it is, therefore, ordered, that there be chosen and appointed able and discrete Chirurgeons, besides those that do already belong to the Pest-house; amongst whom the City and liberties to be quartered as the places lie most apt and convenient; and every of these to have one quarter for his limit; and the said Chirurgeons in every of their limits to join with the Searchers for the view of the body, to the end there may be a true report made of the disease.

“And further, that the said Chirurgeons shall visit and search such like persons as shall either send for them, or be named and directed unto them, by the Examiners of every parish, and inform themselves of the disease of the said parties.

“And, forasmuch as the said Chirurgeons are to be sequestered from all other cures, and kept only to this disease of the infection: it is ordered, that every of the said Chirurgeons shall have twelven-pence a body searched by them, to be paid out of the goods of the party searched, if he be able, or otherwise, by the parish.”

Nurse-keepers.

“If any Nurse-keeper shall remove herself out of any infected house before twenty-eight days after the disease of any person dying of the infection, the house to which the said Nurse-keeper doth so remove herself shall be shut up until the said twenty-eight days be expired.”

ORDERS concerning infected Houses and Persons sick of the Plague.

Notice to be given of the Sickness.

“The Master of every house, as soon as any one in his house complaineth either of botch, or purple, or swelling, in any part of his body, or falleth otherwise dangerously sick, without apparent cause of some other disease, shall give knowledge thereof to the Examiner of health, within two hours after the said sign shall appear.”

Sequestration of the Sick.

“As soon as any man shall be found by this Examiner, Chirurgion, or Searcher, to be sick of the Plague, he shall the same night be sequestered in the same house; and in case he be so sequestered, then, though he afterwards die not, the house wherein he sickened shall be shut up for a month, after the use of the due Preservatives taken by the rest.”

Airing the Stuff.

“For Sequestration of the goods and stuff of the infected, their bedding, and apparel, and hangings of chambers, must be well aired with fire, and such perfumes as are requisite within the infected house, before they be taken again to use: this to be done by the appointment of the Examiner.”

Shutting up of the House.

“If any Person shall have visited any man, known to be infected of the Plague, or entered willingly into any known infected House, being not allowed: the house wherein he inhabiteth shall be shut up for certain days by the Examiner’s directions.”

None to be removed out of Infected Houses, but, &c.

“Item, That none be removed out of the house where he falleth sick of the infection, into any house in the City (except it be to the Pest-house, or a tent, or unto some such house, which the owner of the said visited house holdeth in his own hands, and occupieth by his own servants,) and so as security be given to the parish, whither such remove is made, that the attendance and charge about the said visited persons shall be observed and charged in all the particularities before expressed, without any cost of that parish, to which any such remove shall happen to be made, and this remove to be done by night. And it shall be lawful to any person that hath two houses, to remove either his sound or his infected people to his spare house at his choice, so as if he send away first his sound, he not after send thither the sick, nor again unto the sick the sound. And that the same which he sendeth, be for one week at the least shut up, and secluded from company, for fear of some infection, at the first not appearing.”

Burial of the Dead.

“That the Burial of the Dead by this Visitation be at most convenient hours, always either before sun-rising, or after sun-setting, with the privy of the Church-wardens or Constables, and not otherwise; and that no neighbours nor friends be suffered to accompany the corpse to church, or to enter the house visited, upon pain of having his house shut up, or being imprisoned. And that no corpse dying of infection shall be buried, or remain in any church in time of common prayer, sermon, or lecture. And that no children be suffered at time of burial of any corpse in any church, church-yard, or burying-place, to come near the corpse, coffin, or grave. And that all the graves shall be at least six feet deep.

“And further, all public assemblies at other burials are to be forborne during the continuance of this visitation.”

No Infected Stuff to be Uttered.

“That no clothes, stuff, bedding, or garments, be suffered to be carried or conveyed out of any infected houses, and that the criers and carriers abroad of bedding or old apparel to be sold or pawned, be utterly prohibited and restrained; and no brokers of bedding or old apparel be permitted to make any outward shew, or hang forth on their stalls, shopboards, or windows, towards any street, lane, common way, or passage, any old bedding or apparel to be sold, upon pain of imprisonment. And if any broker or other person shall buy any bedding, apparel, or other stuff, out of any infected house, within two months after the infection hath been there, his house shall be shut up as infected, and so shall continue shut up twenty days at the least.”

No Person to be conveyed out of any Infected House.

“If any Person visited do fortune, by negligent looking unto, or by any other means, to come, or be conveyed from a place infected, to any other place, the parish from whence such party hath come or been conveyed, upon notice thereof given, shall, at their charge, cause the said party so visited, and escaped, to be carried and brought back again by night, and the parties in this case offending to be punished at the direction of the Alderman of the Ward; and the house of the receiver of such visited person to be shut up for twenty days.”

Every Visited House to be Marked.

“That every house visited be marked with a Red Cross of a foot long, in the middle of the door, evident to be seen, and with these usual printed words, that is to say, ‘LORD HAVE MERCY UPON US,’ to be set close over the same Cross, there to continue until lawful opening of the same house.”

Every Visited House to be Watched.

“That the Constables see every house shut up, and to be attended with Watchmen, which may keep them in, and minister necessaries unto them at their own charges (if they be able), or at the common charge if they be unable: the shutting up to be for the space of four weeks after all be whole.

“That precise order be taken that the Searchers, Chirurgeons, Keepers, and Buryers, are not to pass the streets without holding a Red Rod, or Wand, of three foot in length, in their hands, open, and evident to be seen, and are not to go into any other house than into their own, or into that whereunto they are directed or sent for; but to forbear and abstain from company, especially when they have been lately used in any such business or attendance.”

Inmates.

“That where several Inmates are in one and the same house, and any person in that house happens to be infected, no other person or family of such house shall be suffered to remove him or themselves without a certificate from the Examiners of health of that parish; or in default thereof, the house whither he or they so remove, shall be shut up as in case of Visitation.”

Hackney Coaches.

“That care be taken of Hackney-coachmen, that they may not (as some of them have been observed to do), after carrying of infected persons to the Pest-house, and other places, be admitted to common use, till their coaches be well aired, and have stood unemployed by the space of five or six days after such service.”

ORDERS for cleansing, and keeping of the Streets sweet.

The Streets to be kept clean.

“First, it is thought necessary, and so ordered, that every Householder do cause the street to be daily pared before his door, and so to keep it clean swept all the week long.”

That Rakers take it from out the Houses.

“That the sweeping and filth of houses be daily carried away by the Rakers, and that the Raker shall give notice of his coming by the blowing of a horn, as hitherto hath been done.”

Laystalls to be made far off from the City.

“That the Laystalls be removed as far as may be out of the city, and common passages, and that no Nightman or other be suffered to empty a vault into any garden near about the city.”

Care to be had of Unwholesome Fish or Flesh, and of Musty Corn.

“That special care be taken that no stinking Fish, or unwholesome Flesh, or musty Corn, or other corrupt fruits, of what sort soever, be suffered to be sold about the city, or any part of the same.

“That the Brewers and Tippling-houses be looked unto, for musty and unwholesome casks.

“That no hogs, dogs, or cats, or tame pigeons, or conies, be suffered to be kept within any part of the city, or any swine to be, or stray in the streets or lanes, but that such swine be impounded by the beadle, or any other officer, and the owner punished according to Act of Common-council, and that the dogs be killed by the dog-killers appointed for that purpose.”

ORDERS concerning loose Persons and idle Assemblies.

Beggars.

“Forasmuch as nothing is more complained of than the multitudes of Rogues and wandering Beggars that swarm in every place about the city, being a great cause of the spreading of the infection, and will not be avoided, notwithstanding any orders that have been given to the contrary; it is therefore now ordered, that such Constables, and others, whom this matter may any way concern, do take special care that no wandering Beggars be suffered in the streets of this city, in any fashion or manner whatsoever, upon the penalty provided by the law, to be duly and severely executed upon them."

Plays.

"That all Plays, Bear-baitings, Games, singing of Ballads, Buckler-play, or such like causes of Assemblies of People, be utterly prohibited, and the parties offending severely punished by every Alderman in his Ward."

Feasting Prohibited.

"That all public Feasting, and particularly by the Companies of this City, and Dinners at Taverns, Ale-houses, and other places of common Entertainment, be forborne till further order and allowance; and that the Money thereby spared, be preserved and employed for the benefit and relief of the Poor visited with the infection."

Tippling Houses.

"That disorderly Tippling in Taverns, Ale-houses, Coffee-houses, and Cellars, be severely looked unto, as the common sin of this time, and greatest occasion of dispersing the Plague. And that no company or person be suffered to remain or come into any tavern, ale-house, or coffee-house, to drink, after nine of the clock in the evening, according to the ancient Law and Custom of this City, upon the penalties ordained in that behalf."

"And for the better execution of these Orders, and such other rules and directions as upon farther consideration shall be found needful; it is ordered and enjoined, that the Aldermen, Deputies, and Common-council men, shall meet together weekly, once, twice, thrice, or oftener (as cause shall require), at some one general place accustomed in their respective Wards (being clear from infection of the Plague) to consult how the said Orders may be duly put in execution; not intending that any, dwelling in or near places infected, shall come to the said Meetings whilst their coming may be doubtful. And the said Aldermen, and Deputies, and Common-council men, in their several Wards, may put in execution any other good Orders that by them at their said Meetings shall be conceived and devised, for preservation of His Majesty's subjects from the infection."

SIR JOHN LAWRENCE, Lord Mayor.

SIR GEORGE WATERMAN, }
SIR CHARLES DOE, } Sheriffs.

I need not say, that these orders extended only to such places as were within the Lord Mayor's jurisdiction: so it is requisite to observe, that the Justices of the Peace, within those parishes and places as were called the hamlets and out-parts, took the same method. As I remember, the orders for shutting up of houses did not take place so soon on our side, because, as I said before the Plague did not reach to these eastern parts of the town, at least, nor begin to be very violent, till the beginning of August. For example, the whole Bill, from the 11th to the 18th of July, was 1761, yet there died but seventy-one of the Plague in all those parishes we call the Tower-Hamlets; and they were as follow:—

Aldgate	14		34		65

It was, indeed, coming on again; for the burials that same week, were in the next adjoining parishes thus:—

This shutting up of houses was at first counted a very cruel and unchristian method, and the poor people so confined made bitter lamentations.* Complaints of the severity of it were also daily brought to my Lord Mayor, of houses causelessly (and some maliciously) shut up. I cannot say, but upon inquiry, many that complained so loudly were found in a condition to be continued; and others again, inspection being made upon the sick person, and the sickness not appearing infectious, or if uncertain, yet, on his being content to be carried to the Pest-house, were released.

It is true, that the locking up the doors of people's houses, and setting a watchman there night and day, to prevent their stirring out, or any coming to them; when, perhaps, the sound people in the family might have escaped, if they had been removed from the sick, looked very hard and cruel; and many people perished in these miserable confinements, which it is reasonable to believe would not have been distempered if they had had liberty, though the Plague was in the house; at which the people were very clamorous and uneasy at first, and several violences were committed, and injuries offered to the men who were set to watch the houses so shut up: also several people broke out by force, in many places, as I shall

* The practice of shutting up houses on account of the Plague, in 1655, had probably advocates among the Faculty, or we may suppose it would not have been adopted. But Sir Jno. Colbatch, who, when the nation was alarmed on account of the Plague of Marseilles, published "A Scheme for Proper Methods to be taken should it please God to visit us with the Plague," in 1721, proposed the division of the Metropolis into districts, and the establishment of public infirmaries; and "That families of substance, who have servants and all convenience for cleanliness and everything else, be left (when infected) in their own houses, and even then not shut up, only a mark to be set upon them. But that it shall be death for any well person to come out of such house without a white wand in his hand, to warn all people that he belongs to an infected family," p. 14.—See also, Dr. Mead's "Discourse on the Plague," p. 35—37, and 56, 57.—"A Discourse of the Plague." observe by-and-by. But it was a public good that justified the private mischief; and there was no obtaining the least mitigation by any application to magistrates, or government, at that time, at least that I heard of. This put the people upon all manner of stratagem, in order, if possible, to get out; and it would fill a little volume to set down the arts used by the people of such houses to shut the eyes of the watchmen who were employed, to deceive them, and to escape or break out from them, in which frequent scuffles, and some mischief, happened; of which, by itself.

As I went along Houndsditch one morning, about eight o'clock, there was a great noise; it is true, indeed, there was not much crowd, because people were not very free to gather together, or to stay long together, when they were there, nor did I stay long there; but the outcry was loud enough to prompt my curiosity, and I called to one that looked out of a window, and asked what was the matter.

A watchman, it seems, had been employed to keep his post at the door of a house which was infected, or said to be infected, and was shut up; he had been there all night for two nights together, as he told his story, and the day watchman had been there one day, and was now come to relieve him. All this while no noise had been heard in the house, no light had been seen; they called for nothing, sent him of no errands, which used to be the chief business of the watchman; neither had they given him any disturbance, as he said, from the Monday afternoon, when he heard great crying and screaming in the house, which, as he supposed, was occasioned by some of the family dying just at that time. It seems, the night before, the Dead-cart, as it was called, had been stopped there, and a servant-maid had been brought down to the door dead, and the buryers or bearers, as they were called, put her into the cart, wrapped only in a green rug, and carried her away.

The watchman had knocked at the door, it seems, when he heard that noise and crying, as above, and nobody answered a great while; but at last one looked out and said, with an angry quick tone, and yet a kind of crying voice, or a voice of one that was crying, "What d'ye want, that ye make such a knocking?" He answered, "I am the Watchman! how do you do? what is the matter?" The person answered, "What is that to you? Stop the Dead-cart." This, it seems, was about one o'clock: soon after, as the fellow said, he stopped the Dead-cart, and then knocked again, but nobody answered: he continued knocking, and the bellman called out several times, "Bring out your Dead!"—but nobody answered, till the man that drove the cart being called to other houses, would stay no longer, and drove away.

The watchman knew not what to make of all this, so he let them alone till the Morning-man, or Day-watchman, as they called him, came to relieve him: giving him an account of the particulars, they knocked at the door a great while, but nobody answered; and they observed that the window, or casement, at which the person had looked out who had answered before, continued open, being up two pair of stairs.

Upon this, the two men, to satisfy their curiosity, got a long ladder, and one of them went up to the window, and looked into the room, where he saw a woman lying dead upon the floor, in a dismal manner, having no clothes on her but her shift; but though he called aloud, and putting in his long staff, knocked hard on the floor, yet nobody stirred or answered; neither could he hear any noise in the house.

He came down again, upon this, and acquainted his fellow, who went up also, and finding it just so, they resolved to acquaint either the Lord Mayor or some other magistrate of it, but did not offer to go in at the window. The magistrate, it seems, upon the information of the two men, ordered the house to be broken open, a constable and other persons being appointed to be present, that nothing might be plundered; and accordingly it was so done, when nobody was found in the house but that young woman, who, having been infected, and past recovery, the rest had left her to die by herself, and were every one gone, having found some way to delude the watchman, and to get open the door, or get out at some back-door, or over the tops of the houses, so that he knew nothing of it; and as to those cries and shrieks which he heard, it was supposed they were the passionate cries of the family at the bitter parting which, to be sure, it was to them all, this being the sister to the mistress of the family. The man of the house, his wife, several children and servants, being all gone and fled, whether sick or sound, that I could never learn; nor, indeed, did I make much inquiry after it.

Many such escapes were made out of infected houses, as particularly, when the watchman was sent of some errand, for it was his business to go of any errand that the family sent him of, that is to say, for necessaries, such as food and physic; to fetch physicians, if they would come, or surgeons, or nurses, or to order the Dead-cart and the like; but with this condition too, that when he went, he was to lock up the outer-door of the house, and take the key away with him. To evade this, and cheat the watchmen, people got two or three keys made to their locks; or they found ways to unscrew the locks, such as were screwed on, and so take off the lock, being in the inside of the house, and while they sent away the watchman to the market, to the bake-house, or for one trifle or another, would open the door, and go out as often as they pleased. But this being found out, the officers afterwards had orders to padlock up the doors on the outside, and place bolts on them as they thought fit.

At another house, as I was informed, in the street next within Aldgate, a whole family was shut up and locked in, because the maid-servant was taken sick; the master of the house had complained by his friends to the next Alderman, and to the Lord Mayor, and had consented to have the maid carried to the Pest-house, but was refused, so the door was marked with a Red Cross, a padlock on the outside, as above, and a watchman set to keep the door according to public order.

After the master of the house found there was no remedy, but that he, his wife, and his children were to be locked up with this poor distempered servant, he called to the watchman, and told him he must go then and fetch a nurse for them, to attend this poor girl, for that it would be certain death to them all to oblige them to nurse her; and told him plainly, that if he would not do this, the maid must perish either of the distemper, or be starved for want of food, for he was resolved none of his family should go near her, and she lay in the garret, four story high, where she could not cry out, or call to anybody for help.

The watchman consented to that, and went and fetched a nurse, as he was appointed, and brought her to them the same evening. During this interval, the master of the house took his opportunity to break a large hole through his shop into a bulk or stall, where formerly a cobbler had sat, before or under his shop window, but the tenant, as may be supposed, at such a dismal time as that, was dead or removed, and so he had the key in his own keeping. Having made his way into this stall, which he could not have done if the man had been at the door, the noise he was obliged to make being such as would have alarmed the watchman; I say, having made his way into this stall, he sat still till the watchman returned with the nurse, and all the next day also; but the night following having contrived to send the watchman of another trifling errand, which, as I take it, was to an apothecary's for a plaster for the maid, which he was to stay for the making up, or some other such errand that might secure his staying some time; in that time he conveyed himself and all his family out of the house, and left the nurse and the watchman to bury the poor wench; that is, throw her into the cart, and take care of the house.

I could give a great many such stories as these, diverting enough, which, in the long course of that dismal year I met with, that is, heard of, and which are very certain to be true, or very near the truth; that is to say, true in the general, for no man could at such a time learn all the particulars. There was, likewise, violence used with the watchman, as was reported, in abundance of places; and, I believe, that from the beginning of the visitation to the end, there were not less than eighteen or twenty of them killed, or so wounded as to be taken up for dead; which was supposed to be done by the people in the infected houses which were shut up, and where they attempted to come out, and were opposed.

up; and as the people shut up, or imprisoned so, were guilty of no crime, only shut up because miserable, it was really the more intolerable to them.

It had also this difference, that every prison, as we may call it, had but one jailor, and as he had the whole house to guard, and that many houses were so situated as that they had several ways out, some more, some less, and some into several streets; it was impossible for one man so to guard all the passages as to prevent the escape of people made desperate by the fright of their circumstances, by the resentment of their usage, or by the raging of the distemper itself; so that they would talk to the watchman on one side of the house, while the family made their escape at another.

For example, in Coleman-street there are abundance of alleys, as appears still: a house was shut up in that they call White's alley, and this house had a back window, not a door, into a court, which had a passage into Bell-alley; a watchman was set by the constable at the door of this house, and there he stood, or his comrade, night and day, while the family went all away in the evening, out at that window into the court, and left the poor fellows warding and watching, for near a fortnight.

Not far from the same place they blowed up a watchman with gunpowder, and burnt the poor fellow dreadfully, and while he made hideous cries, and nobody would venture to come near to help him, the whole family that were able to stir, got out at the windows, one story high: two that were left sick, calling out for help, care was taken to give them nurses to look after them; but the persons who fled were never found till after the Plague was abated, when they returned, but as nothing could be proved, so nothing could be done to them.

It is to be considered, too, that as these were prisons without bars and bolts, which our common prisons are furnished with, so the people let themselves down out of their windows, even in the face of the watchman, bringing swords or pistols in their hands, and threatening the poor wretch to shoot him, if he stirred, or called for help.

In other cases, some had gardens, and walls, or pales, between them and their neighbours; or yards and back-houses: and these, by friendship and entreaties, would get leave to get over those walls or pales, and so go out at their neighbours' doors; or by giving money to their servants, get them to let them through in the night; so that, in short, the shutting up of houses was in no wise to be depended upon, neither did it answer the end at all, serving more to make the people desperate, and to drive them to such extremities as that they would break out at all adventures.

And that which was still worse, those that did thus break out, spread the infection farther by their wandering about with the distemper upon them, in their desperate circumstances, than they would otherwise have done; for whoever considers all the particulars in such cases must acknowledge, and we cannot doubt but the severity of those confinements made many people desperate, and made them run out of their houses at all hazards, and with the Plague visibly upon them, not knowing either whither to go, or what to do, or, indeed, what they did; and many that did so were driven to dreadful exigencies and extremities, and perished in the streets or fields for mere want, or dropped down by the raging violence of the fever upon them. Others wandered into the country, and went forward any way as their desperation guided them, not knowing whither they went or would go, till, faint and tired, and not getting any relief (the houses and villages on the road refusing to admit them to lodge, whether infected or no,) they have perished by the road side, or gotten into barns and died there, none daring to come to them, or relieve them, though perhaps not infected, for nobody would believe them.*

On the other hand, when the Plague at first seized a family, that is to say, when any one body of the family had gone out, and unwarily or otherwise caught the distemper, and brought it home, it was certainly known by the family before it was known to the officers, who, as you will see by the order, were appointed to examine into the circumstances of all sick persons, when they heard of their being sick.

In this interval, between their being taken sick, and the examiner's coming, the master of the house had leisure and liberty to remove himself, or all his family, if he knew whither to go, and many did so; but the great disaster was, that many did thus, after they were really infected themselves, and so carried the disease into the houses of those who were so hospitable as to receive them, which, it must be confessed, was very cruel and ungrateful.

And this was, in part, the reason of the general notion, or scandal rather, which went about of the temper of people infected; namely, that they did not take the least care, nor make any scruple of infecting others; though

* A remarkable occurrence, bearing on this subject, is thus related in the "Newes," No. 79:—"Dorchester, September 23rd. It is a peculiar blessing that this town continues yet free from any contagious disease; and the Providence appears the greater in regard of so many persons that have come hither from infected places; and, in truth, the care and vigilance of our magistrates have been great in providing a conveniency of houses and accommodation in the fields, for persons coming into these parts. Only this week, one coming from London died within a mile of this town, after four days' illness, supposed to be the Plague; but the hovel wherein he lay being boarded over and under, a pit was digged, and both hovel and corpse were buried together."

I cannot say but there might be some truth in it too, but not so general as was reported. What natural reason could be given for so wicked a thing, at a time when they might conclude themselves just going to appear at the bar of Divine Justice, I know not. I am very well satisfied that it cannot be reconciled to religion and principle, any more than it can be to generosity and humanity; but I may speak of that again.

I am speaking now of people made desperate by the apprehensions of their being shut up, and their breaking out by stratagem or force, either before or after they were shut up, whose misery was not lessened when they were out, but sadly increased. On the other hand, many that thus got away, had retreats to go to, and other houses, where they locked themselves up, and kept hid till the Plague was over; and many families, foreseeing the approach of the distemper, laid up stores of provisions sufficient for their whole families, and shut themselves up, and that so entirely, that they were neither seen nor heard of till the infection was quite ceased, and then came abroad sound and well. I might recollect several such as these, and give you the particulars of their management; for, doubtless, it was the most effectual secure step that could be taken for such whose circumstances would not admit them to remove, or who had not retreats abroad proper for the case; for, in being thus shut up, they were as if they had been a hundred miles off. Nor do I remember that any one of those families miscarried: among these, several Dutch merchants were particularly remarkable, who kept their houses like little garrisons besieged, suffering none to go in or out, or come near them; particularly one in a court in Throckmorton street, whose house looked into Drapers'-garden.

But I come back to the case of families infected, and shut up by the Magistrates; the misery of those families is not to be expressed, and it was generally in such houses that we heard the most dismal shrieks and outcries of the poor people, terrified and even frightened to death, by the sight of the condition of their dearest relations, and by the terror of being imprisoned as they were.

I remember (and while I am writing this story, I think I hear the very sound of it) a certain lady had an only daughter, a young maiden about nineteen years old, and who was possessed of a very considerable fortune; they were only lodgers in the house where they were. The young woman, her mother, and the maid, had been abroad on some occasion, I do not remember what, for the house was not shut up; but about two hours after they came home, the young lady complained she was not well; in a quarter of an hour more she vomited, and had a violent pain in her head. "Pray God" says her mother, in a terrible fright, "my child has not the distemper!" The pain in her head increasing, her mother ordered the bed to be warmed, and resolved to put her to bed, and prepared to give her things to sweat, which was the ordinary remedy to be taken when the first apprehensions of the distemper began.

While the bed was airing, the mother undressed the young woman, and just as she was laid down in bed, she, looking upon her body with a candle, immediately discovered the fatal Tokens on the inside of her thighs.*

* In a conversation at a meeting of the Royal Society, in March, 1666, Dr. Merret related, that he had been informed by Dr. Hodges (the author of the Loimologia, who during the Plague had officiated as one of the City Physicians) that "the true pestilential spots, called the Tokens, were a gangrenated flesh of a pyramidal figure, penetrating to the very bone, with its basis downward, altogether mortified and insensible, though a pin or any other sharp body were thrust into it; and

Her mother, not being able to contain herself, threw down her candle, and shrieked out in such a frightful manner, that it was enough to place horror upon the stoutest heart in the world; nor was it one scream, or one cry; but the fright having seized her spirits, she fainted first, then recovered, then ran all over the house, up the stairs and down the stairs, like one distracted, and indeed, she really was distracted; and continued screeching and crying out for several hours, void of all sense, or at least government of her senses, and, as I was told, never came thoroughly to herself again. As to the young maiden, she was a dead corpse from that moment; for the gangrene which occasions the spots had spread [through] her whole body, and she died in less than two hours; but still the mother continued crying out, not knowing anything more of her child, several hours after she was dead. It is so long ago that I am not certain; but I think the mother never recovered, but died in two or three weeks after.*

This was an extraordinary case, and I am therefore the more particular in it, because I came so much to the knowledge of it; but there were innumerable such like cases; and it was seldom that the weekly bill came in, but there were two or three put in "frighted," that is,

(what the Doctor thought particularly remarkable) the next adjoining parts of the flesh, though not discoloured, yet mortified as well as the discoloured ones."—Vide Birch's "History of the Royal Society," vol. ii, p. 76.

* The numbers of those who died of fright, in six consecutive years, as recorded in the Bills of Mortality, were as follows:—

In 1664 .....	1	In 1667 .....	7
1665 .....	23	1668 .....	1
1666 .....	16	1669 .....	1

It may therefore be assumed that the calamities arising from the Plague and Fire in 1665 and 1666, were the main causes of the great increase of deaths from fright in those years.

that may well be called, frightened to death. But besides those who were so frightened as to die upon the spot, there were great numbers frightened to other extremes, some frightened out of their senses, some out of their memory, and some out of their understanding: but I return to the shutting up of houses.

As several people, I say, got out of their houses by stratagem after they were shut up, so others got out by bribing the watchmen, and giving them money to let them go privately out in the night. I must confess, I thought it at that time the most innocent corruption, or bribery, that any man could be guilty of; and therefore could not but pity the poor men, and think it was hard when three of those watchmen were publicly whipped through the streets for suffering people to go out of the houses shut up.

But notwithstanding that severity, money prevailed with the poor men, and many families found means to make sallies out, and escape that way, after they had been shut up: but these were generally such as had some places to retire to; and though there was no easy passing the roads any whither, after the first of August, yet there were many ways of retreat, and particularly, as I hinted, some got tents, and set them up in the fields, carrying beds, or straw, to lie on, and provisions to eat, and so lived in them as hermits in a cell; for nobody would venture to come near them, and several stories were told of such; some comical, some tragical; some, who lived like wandering pilgrims in the deserts, escaped by making themselves exiles in such a manner as is scarce to be credited, and who yet enjoyed more liberty than was to be expected in such cases.

I have by me a story of two brothers and their kinsman, who, being single men, but that had stayed in the city too long to get away, and, indeed, not knowing where to go to have any retreat, nor having wherewith to travel far, took a course for their own preservation, which, though in itself at first desperate, yet was so natural, that it may be wondered that no more did so at that time. They were but of mean condition, and yet not so very poor as that they could not furnish themselves with some little conveniences, such as might serve to keep life and soul together; and finding the distemper increasing in a terrible manner, they resolved to shift as well as they could, and to be gone.

One of them had been a soldier in the late wars, and before that in the Low Countries; and having been bred to no particular employment but arms, and besides, being wounded, and not able to work very hard, had for some time been employed at a baker's of sea-biscuit in Wapping.

The brother of this man was a seaman too, but somehow or other, had been hurt of one leg, that he could not go to sea, but had worked for his living at a sail-maker's in Wapping, or thereabouts; and, being a good husband, had laid up some money, and was the richest of the three.

The third man was a joiner or carpenter by trade, a handy fellow; and he had no wealth but his basket of tools, with the help of which he could at any time get his living, such a time as this excepted, wherever he went; and he lived near Shadwell.

They all lived in Stepney parish, which, as I have said, being the last that was infected, or at least violently, they stayed there till they evidently saw the Plague was abating at the west part of the town, and coming towards the east, where they lived.

The story of those three men, if the reader will be content to have me give it in their own persons, without taking upon me to either vouch the particulars, or answer for any mistakes, I shall give as distinctly as I can, believing the history will be a very good pattern for any poor man to follow, in case the like public desolation should happen here;* and if there may be no such occasion, which God of his infinite mercy grant us, still the story may have its uses so many ways as that it will, I hope, never be said, that the relating has been unprofitable.

I say all this previous to the history, having yet, for the present, much more to say before I quit my own part.

I went all the first part of the time freely about the streets, though not so freely as to run myself into apparent danger, except when they dug the great pit in the churchyard of our parish of Aldgate; a terrible pit it was, and I could not resist my curiosity to go and see it; as near as I may judge, it was about forty feet in length, and about fifteen or sixteen feet broad; and at the time I first looked at it, about nine feet deep; but it was said they dug it near twenty feet deep afterwards, in one part of it, till they could go no deeper for the water: for they had, it seems, dug several large pits before this; for though the Plague was long a coming to our parish, yet, when it did come, there was no parish in or about London where it raged with such violence as in the two parishes of Aldgate and Whitechapel.

They had dug several pits in another ground, when the distemper began to spread in our parish, and especially when the dead-carts began to go about, which was not in our parish till the beginning of August. Into these pits they had put perhaps fifty or sixty bodies each; then they made larger holes, wherein they buried all that the cart brought in a week, which, by the middle to the end of August, came to from 200 to 400 a week; and they could not well dig them larger, because of the order of the magistrates, confining them to leave no bodies within six feet of the surface; and the water coming on, at about seventeen or eighteen feet, they could not well, I say, put more in one pit; but now, at the beginning of September, the Plague raging in a dreadful manner, and the number of burials in our parish increasing to more than was ever buried in any parish about London of no larger extent, they ordered this dreadful gulf to be dug, for such it was, rather than a pit.

They had supposed this pit would have supplied them for a month or more, when they dug it, and some blamed the church-wardens for suffering such a frightful thing, telling them they were making preparations to bury the whole parish, and the like; but time made it appear, the church-wardens knew the condition of the parish better than they did; for the pit being finished the 4th of September, I think they began to bury in it the 6th, and by the 20th, which was just two weeks, they had thrown into it 1114 bodies, when they were obliged to fill it up, the bodies being then come to lie within six feet of the surface. I doubt not but there may be some ancient persons alive in the parish who can justify the fact of this, and are able to shew even in what part of the church-yard the pit lay better than I can; the mark of it, also, was many years to be seen in the church-yard, on the surface lying in length parallel with the passage which goes by the west wall of the church-yard, out of Hounds-

It was about the 10th of September, that my curiosity led or, rather drove, me to go and see this pit again, when there had been near 400 people buried in it; and I was not content to see it in the day-time, as I had done before, for then there would have been nothing to have been seen but the loose earth; for all the bodies that were thrown in were immediately covered with earth, by those they called the buryers, which at other times were called bearers; but I resolved to go in the night and see some of them thrown in.

There was a strict order to prevent people coming to those pits, and that was only to prevent infection; but after some time that order was more necessary; for people that were infected, and near their end, and delirious also, would run to those pits, wrapped in blankets or rugs, and throw themselves in, and, as they said, bury themselves. I cannot say that the officers suffered any willingly to lie there; but I have heard, that in a great pit in Finsbury,* in the parish of Cripplegate, it lying open then to the fields, for it was not then walled about, they came and threw themselves in, and expired there before they threw any earth upon them: and that when they came to bury others, and found them there, they were quite dead, though not cold.

This may serve a little to describe the dreadful condition of that day, though it is impossible to say anything that is able to give a true idea of it to those who did not see it, other than this, that it was indeed very, very, very dreadful, and such as no tongue can express!

*The Finsbury pit is thus alluded to by Pepys, under the date of August 30th.—“I went forth and walked towards Moorfields to see (God forgive my presumption!) whether I could see any dead corpse going to the grave; but, as God would have it, did not. But Lord! how everybody looks, and discourses in the street of death, and nothing else, and few people going up and down, that the town is like a place distressed and forsaken.”

I got admittance into the church-yard by being acquainted with the sexton who attended, who, though he did not refuse me at all, yet earnestly persuaded me not to go; telling me very seriously, for he was a good, religious, and sensible man, that it was, indeed, their business and duty to venture and to run all hazards, and that in it they might hope to be preserved; but that I had no apparent call to it but my own curiosity, which he said he believed I would not pretend was sufficient to justify my running that hazard. I told him I had been pressed in my mind to go, and that perhaps it might be an instructing sight that might not be without its uses. "Nay," says the good man, "if you will venture upon that score, name of God go in; for, depend upon it, 'twill be a sermon to you, it may be the best that ever you heard in your life. It is a speaking sight," says he, "and has a voice with it, and a loud one, to call us to repentance;" and with that he opened the door, and said, "Go, if you will."

His discourse had shocked my resolution a little, and I stood wavering for a good while, but just at that interval I saw two links come over from the end of the Minories, and heard the bellman, and then appeared a dead-cart, as they called it, coming over the streets, so I could no longer resist my desire of seeing it, and went in. There was nobody, as I could perceive at first, in the church-yard, or going into it, but the buryers and the fellow that drove the cart, or rather led the horse and cart; but when they came up to the pit, they saw a man go to and again, muffled up in a brown cloak, and making motions with his hands under his cloak, as if he was in a great agony, and the buryers immediately gathered about him, supposing he was one of those poor delirious or desperate creatures that used to pretend, as I have said, to bury themselves! He said nothing as he walked about, but two or three times groaned very deeply and loud, and sighed as he would break his heart.

When the buryers came up to him, they soon found he was neither a person infected and desperate, as I have observed above, nor a person distempered in mind, but one oppressed with a dreadful weight of grief indeed, having his wife and several of his children, all in the cart that was just come in with him, and he followed in an agony and excess of sorrow. He mourned heartily, as it was easy to see; but with a kind of masculine grief that could not give itself vent by tears, and calmly desiring the buryers to let him alone, said he would only see the bodies thrown in and go away, so they left importuning him; but no sooner was the cart turned round, and the bodies shot into the pit promiscuously, which was a surprise to him, for he at least expected they would have been decently laid in, though, indeed, he was afterwards convinced that was impracticable; I say, no sooner did he see the sight, but he cried out aloud, unable to contain himself. I could not hear what he said, but he went backward two or three steps, and fell down in a swoon; the buryers ran to him, and took him up, and in a little while he came to himself, and they led him away to the Pye-tavern, over-against the end of Houndsditch,* where, it seems, the man was known, and where they took care of him. He looked into the pit again as he went away, but the buryers had covered the bodies so immediately with throwing in the earth, that though there was light enough, for there were lanterns with candles in them, placed all night round the sides of the pit upon the heaps of earth, seven or eight, or perhaps more, yet nothing could be seen.

* The Pye Tavern, or, as it is now called, the Crown and Magpie, still exists in Aldgate High-street;—the Three Nuns Inn (mentioned in p. 81) is likewise yet remaining, has a great business, and is much frequented by travellers from the eastern counties.

This was a mournful scene, indeed, and affected me almost as much as the rest, but the other was awful and full of terror. The cart had in it sixteen or seventeen bodies; some were wrapped up in linen sheets, some in rugs, some little other than naked, or so loose, that what covering they had fell from them, in the shooting out of the cart, and they fell quite naked among the rest; but the matter was not much to them, or the indecency much to any one else, seeing they were all dead, and were to be huddled together into the common Grave of Mankind, as we may call it, for here was no difference made, but poor and rich went together. There was no other way of burials, neither was it possible there should, for coffins were not to be had for the prodigious numbers that fell in such a calamity as this.

It was reported, by way of scandal upon the buryers, that if any corpse was delivered to them decently wound up, as we called it then, in a winding sheet, tied over the head and feet, which some did, and which was generally of good linen; I say, it was reported, that the buryers were so wicked as to strip them in the cart, and carry them quite naked to the ground; but as I cannot easily credit anything so vile among Christians, and at a time so filled with terrors as that was, I can only relate it, and leave it undetermined.

Innumerable stories also went about of the cruel behaviours and practices of nurses, who tended the sick, and of their hastening on the fate of those they tended in their sickness, but I shall say more of this in its place.

I was indeed shocked with this sight; it almost overwhelmed me, and I went away with my heart most afflicted and full of afflicting thoughts, such as I cannot describe. Just at my going out of the church-yard, and turning up the street towards my own house, I saw another cart with links and a bellman going before, coming out of Harrow-alley, in the Butcher-row, on the other side of the way, and being, as I perceived, very full of dead bodies, it went directly over the street also towards the church. I stood awhile, but I had no stomach to go back again to see the same dismal scene over again, so I went directly home, where I could not but consider, with thankfulness, the risk I had run, believing I had gotten no injury, as, indeed, I had not.

Here the poor unhappy gentleman's grief came into my head again, and, indeed, I could not but shed tears in the reflection upon it, perhaps more than he did himself; but his case lay so heavy upon my mind, that I could not prevail with myself, but that I must go out again into the street, and go to the Pye-tavern, resolving to inquire what became of him.

It was by this time one o'clock in the morning, and yet the poor gentleman was there; the truth was, the people of the house knowing him, had entertained him, and kept him there all the night, notwithstanding the danger of being infected by him, though it appeared the man was perfectly sound himself.

It is with regret, that I take notice of this tavern: the people were civil, mannerly, and an obliging sort of folks enough, and had till this time kept their house open, and their trade going on, though not so very publicly as formerly; but there was a dreadful set of fellows that used their house, and who, in the middle of all this horror, met there every night, and behaved with all the revelling and roaring extravagancies, as is usual for such people to do at other times, and, indeed, to such an offensive degree, that the very master and mistress of the house grew first ashamed, and then terrified at them.

They sat generally in a room next the street; and as they always kept late hours, so when the dead-cart came across the street end to go into Houndsditch, which was in view of the Tavern windows, they would frequently open the windows as soon as they heard the bell, and look out at them; and as they might often hear sad lamentations of people in the streets, or at their windows, as the carts went along, they would make their impudent mocks and jeers at them, especially if they heard the poor people call upon God to have mercy upon them, as many would do at those times in their ordinary passing along the streets.

These gentlemen being something disturbed with the clutter of bringing the poor gentleman into the house, as above, were first angry, and very high with the master of the house, for suffering such a fellow, as they called him, to be brought out of the grave into their house; but being answered, that the man was a neighbour, and that he was sound, but overwhelmed with the calamity of his family, and the like, they turned their anger into ridiculing the man, and his sorrow for his wife and children; taunting him with want of courage to leap into the great pit, and go to heaven, as they jeeringly expressed it, along with them; adding some very profane, and even blasphemous expressions.

They were at this vile work when I came back to the house; and as far as I could see, though the man sat still, mute, and disconsolate, and their affronts could not divert his sorrow, yet he was both grieved and offended at their discourse. Upon this I gently reprov'd them, being well enough acquainted with their characters, and not unknown in person to two of them.

They immediately fell upon me with ill language and oaths; asked me what I did out of my grave, at such a time when so many honest men were carried into the church-yard? and why I was not at home, saying my prayers, against the dead-cart came for me? and the like.

I was indeed astonished at the impudence of the men, though not at all discomposed at their treatment of me; however, I kept my temper. I told them, that though I defied them, or any man in the world, to tax me with any dishonesty, yet, I acknowledged, that in this terrible Judgment of God, many better than I were swept away, and carried to their grave; but to answer their question directly, the case was, that I was mercifully preserved by that great God, whose name they had blasphemed and taken in vain, by cursing and swearing in a dreadful manner; and that I believed I was preserved in particular (among other ends of his goodness), that I might reprove them for their audacious boldness, in behaving in such a manner, and in such an awful time as this was; especially, for their jeering and mocking at an honest gentleman, and a neighbour, for some of them knew him, who they saw was overwhelmed with sorrow, for the breaches which it had pleased God to make upon his family.

I cannot call exactly to mind the hellish abominable raillery, which was the return they made to that talk of mine, being provok'd, it seems, that I was not at all afraid to be free with them; nor, if I could remember, would I fill my account with any of the words, the horrid oaths, curses, and vile expressions, such as, at that time of the day, even the worst and ordinarist people in the street would not use;—for except such hardened creatures as these, the most wicked wretches that could be found, had at that time some terror upon their minds of the Hand of that Power which could thus, in a moment, destroy them.

But that which was the worst in all their devilish language was, that they were not afraid to blaspheme God, and talk atheistically; making a jest at my calling the Plague the Hand of God, mocking, and even laughing at the word Judgment, as if the providence of God had no concern in the inflicting such a desolating stroke; and that the people calling upon God, as they saw the carts carrying away the dead bodies, was all enthusiastic, absurd, and impertinent.

I made them some reply, such as I thought proper, but which I found was so far from putting a check to their horrid way of speaking, that it made them rail the more; so that I confess it filled me with horror and a kind of rage, and I came away, as I told them, lest the hand of that Judgment which had visited the whole city should glorify his vengeance upon them, and all that were near them.

They received all reproof with the utmost contempt, and made the greatest mockery that was possible for them to do at me, giving me all the opprobrious insolent scoffs that they could think of, for preaching to them, as they called it, which indeed grieved me rather than angered me; and I went away, blessing God, however, in my mind, that I had not spared them, though they had insulted me so much.

They continued this wretched course three or four days after this, continually mocking and jeering at all that showed themselves religious or serious, or that were in any way touched with the sense of the terrible Judgment of God upon us, and I was informed they flouted in the same manner at the good people who, notwithstanding the contagion, met at the church, fasted, and prayed to God to remove his hand from them.

I say, they continued this dreadful course three or four days, I think it was no more, when one of them, particularly he who asked the poor gentleman "what he did out of his grave?" was struck from Heaven with the Plague, and died in a most deplorable manner; and, in a word, they were every one of them carried into the great Pit, which I have mentioned above, before it was quite filled up, which was not above a fortnight, or thereabout.

These men were guilty of many extravagances, such as one would think human nature should have trembled at the thoughts of, at such a time of general terror as was then upon us; and particularly scoffing and mocking at every thing which they happened to see that was religious among the people, especially at their thronging zealously to the place of public worship, to implore mercy from Heaven in such a time of distress; and this tavern, where they held their club, being within view of the church door, they had the more particular occasion for their atheistical profane mirth.

But this began to abate a little with them before the accident, which I have related, happened; for the infection increased so violently at this part of the town now, that people began to be afraid to come to the church, at least such numbers did not resort thither as was usual: many of the clergymen likewise were dead, and others gone into the country; for it really required a steady courage, and a strong faith, for a man, not only to venture being in town at such a time as this, but likewise to venture to come to church and perform the office of a minister to a congregation, of whom he had reason to believe many of them were actually infected with the Plague, and to do this every day, or twice a day, as in some places was done.

It is true, the people showed an extraordinary zeal in these religious exercises, and as the church doors were always open, people would go in single at all times, whether the minister was officiating or no, and locking themselves into separate pews, would be praying to God with great fervency and devotion.

Others assembled at meeting-houses, every one as their different opinions in such things guided, but all were promiscuously the subject of these men's drollery, especially at the beginning of the visitation.

It seems they had been checked for their open insulting religion in this manner, by several good people of every persuasion, and that, and the violent raging of the infection, I suppose, was the occasion that they had abated much of their rudeness for some time before, and were only roused by the spirit of ribaldry and atheism at the clamour which was made when the gentleman was first brought in there, and, perhaps, were agitated by the same devil when I took upon me to reprove them; though I did it at first with all the calmness, temper, and good manners that I could, which, for a while, they insulted me the more for, thinking it had been in fear of their resentment, though afterwards they found the contrary.

I went home indeed, grieved and afflicted in my mind, at the abominable wickedness of those men, not doubting, however, that they would be made dreadful examples of God's justice: for I looked upon this dismal time to be a particular season of divine vengeance, and that God would, on this occasion, single out the proper objects of his displeasure, in a more especial and remarkable manner than at another time; and that, though I did believe that many good people would, and did, fall in the common calamity, and that it was no certain rule to judge of the eternal state of any one, by their being distinguished in such a time of general destruction, neither one way or other; yet, I say, it could not but seem reasonable to believe, that God would not think fit to spare by his mercy such open declared enemies, that should insult his name and being, defy his vengeance, and mock at his worship and worshippers, at such a time;—no, not though his mercy had thought fit to bear with, and spare them at other times: that this was a day of visitation, a day of God's anger; and those words came into my thought,—Jer. v. 9. “Shall I not visit for these things, saith the Lord, and shall not my soul be avenged of such a nation as this?”

These things, I say, lay upon my mind; and I went home very much grieved and oppressed with the horror of these men's wickedness, and to think that anything could be so vile, so hardened, and so notoriously wicked, as to insult God and his servants, and his worship, in such a manner, and at such a time as this was; when he had, as it were, his sword drawn in his hand, on purpose to take vengeance, not on them only, but on the whole nation.

I had, indeed, been in some passion at first with them, though it was really raised, not by any affront they had offered me personally, but by the horror their blaspheming tongues filled me with; however, I was doubtful in my thoughts, whether the resentment I retained was not all upon my own private account, for they had given me a great deal of ill language too, I mean personally; but after some pause, and having a weight of grief upon my mind, I retired myself, as soon as I came home, for I slept not that night; and giving God most humble thanks for my preservation in the imminent danger I had been in, I set my mind seriously, and with the utmost earnestness, to pray for those desperate wretches, that God would pardon them, open their eyes, and effectually humble them.

By this, I not only did my duty, namely, to pray for those who despitefully used me, but I fully tried my own heart, to my full satisfaction, that it was not filled with any spirit of resentment, as they had offended me in particular; and I humbly recommend the method to all those that would know, or be certain, how to distinguish between their real zeal for the honour of God, and the effects of their private passions and resentment.

But I must go back here to the particular incidents which occur to my thoughts of the time of the visitation, and particularly to the time of their shutting up houses, in the first part of the sickness; for before the sickness was come to its height, people had more room to make their observations than they had afterward; but when it was in the extremity, there was no such thing as communication with one another, as before.

During the shutting up of houses, as I have said, some violence was offered to the watchmen; as to soldiers, there were none to be found; the few Guards which the King then had, which were nothing like the number entertained since, were dispersed, either at Oxford with the court, or in quarters in the remoter parts of the country; small detachments excepted, who did duty at the Tower, and at Whitehall, and these but very few; neither am I positive that there was any other guard at the Tower, than the Warders, as they call them, who stand at the gate with gowns and caps, the same as the Yeomen of the Guard; except the ordinary gunners, who were twenty-four, and the officers appointed to look after the magazine, who were called armourers: as to trained bands, there was no possibility of raising any; neither if the Lieutenancy, either of London or Middlesex, had ordered the drums to beat for the Militia, would any of the companies, I believe, have drawn together, whatever risk they had run.

This made the watchmen be the less regarded, and perhaps occasioned the greater violence to be used against them. I mention it on this score, to observe that the setting watchmen thus to keep the people in, was, first of all, not effectual, but that the people broke out, whether by force or by stratagem, even almost as often as they pleased; and secondly, that those that did thus break out, were generally people infected, who, in their desperation, running about from one place to another, valued not who they injured, and which, perhaps, as I have said, might give birth to the report, that it was natural to the infected people to desire to infect others; which report was really false.

And I know it so well, and in so many several cases, that I could give several relations of good, pious, and religious people, who, when they have had the distemper, have been so far from being forward to infect others, that they have forbid their own family to come near them, in hopes of their being preserved; and have even died without seeing their nearest relations, lest they should be instrumental to give them the distemper, and infect or endanger them. If then there were cases wherein the infected people were careless of the injury they did to others, this was certainly one of them, (if not the chief,) namely, when people, who had the distemper, had broken out from houses which were so shut up, and having been driven to extremities for provision, or for entertainment, had endeavoured to conceal their condition, and have been thereby instrumental, involuntarily, to infect others who were ignorant and unwary.

This is one of the reasons why I believed then, and do believe still, that the shutting up of houses thus by force, and restraining, or rather imprisoning people in their own houses, as is said above, was of little or no service in the whole; nay, I am of opinion it was rather hurtful, having forced those desperate people to wander abroad with the Plague upon them, who would otherwise have died quietly in their beds.

I remember one citizen, who having thus broken out of his house in Aldersgate-street, or thereabout, went along the road to Islington: he attempted to have gone in at the Angel Inn, and after that at the White Horse, two inns known still by the same signs, but was refused; after which he came to the Pied Bull, an inn also still continuing the same sign; he asked them for lodging for one night only, pretending to be going into Lincolnshire, and assuring them of his being very sound, and free from the infection, which also at that time, had not reached much that way.*

They told him they had no lodging that they could spare, but one bed, up in the garret, and that they could spare that bed but for one night; some drovers being expected the next day, with cattle; so, if he would accept of that lodging he might have it, which he did ; so a servant was sent up with a candle with him, to show him the room. He was very well dressed, and looked like a person not used to lie in a garret, and when he came to the room, he fetched a deep sigh, and said to the servant, " I have seldom lain in such a lodging as this ;" however, the servant assured him again that they had no better. " Well," says he, " I must make shift ; this is a dreadful time, but it is but for one night." So he sat down upon the bedside, and bade the maid, I think it was, fetch him up a pint of warm ale ; accordingly, the servant went for the ale ; but some hurry in the house, which perhaps employed her otherways, put it out of her head ; and she went up no more to him.

The next morning, seeing no appearance of the gentleman, somebody in the house asked the servant that had shewed him up stairs, " what was become of him ?" She started : " Alas !" says she, " I never thought more of him ; he bade me carry him some warm ale, but I forgot : " upon which, not the maid, but some other person was sent up to see after him, who, coming into the room, found him stark dead, and almost cold, stretched out across the bed ; his clothes were pulled off, his jaw fallen, his eyes open in a most frightful posture, the rug of the bed being grasped hard in one of his hands ; so that it was plain he died soon after the maid left him, and, it is probable, had she gone up with the ale, she had found him dead in a few minutes after he sat down upon the bed. The alarm was great in the house, as any one may suppose, they having been free from the Distemper till that disaster, which, bringing the infection to the house, spread it immediately to other houses round about it. I do not remember how many died in the house itself, but I think the maid-servant who went up first with him, fell presently ill by the fright, and several others; for whereas there died but two in Islington of the Plague the week before, there died seventeen the week after, whereof fourteen were of the Plague: this was in the week from the 11th of July to the 18th.

There was one shift that some families had, and that not a few, when their houses happened to be infected, and that was this:—The families who, in the first breaking out of the distemper, fled away into the country, and had retreats among their friends, generally found some or other of their neighbours or relations to commit the charge of those houses to, for the safety of the goods, and the like. Some houses were, indeed, entirely locked up, the doors padlocked, the windows and doors having deal boards nailed over them, and only the inspection of them committed to the ordinary watchman and parish officers; but these were but few.

It was thought that there were not less than 10,000 houses forsaken of the inhabitants in the City and suburbs, including what was in the out-parishes, and in Surrey, or the side of the water they called Southwark. This was besides the numbers of lodgers, and of particular persons who were fled out of other families; so that it was computed that about 200,000 were fled and gone in all. But of this I shall speak again; but I mention it here on this account, namely:—that it was a rule with those who had thus two houses in their keeping or care, that if anybody was taken sick in a family, before the master of the family let the examiners or any other officer know of it, he immediately would send all the rest of his family, whether children or servants, as it fell out to be, to such other house which he had so in charge, and then giving notice of the sick person to the examiner, have a nurse or nurses appointed; and have another person to be shut up in the house with them (which many for money would consent to) to take charge of the house, in case the person should die.

This was, in many cases, the saving a whole family, who, if they had been shut up with the sick person, would inevitably have perished. But, on the other hand, this was another of the inconveniences of shutting up houses; for the apprehensions and terror of being shut up made many run away with the rest of the family, who, though it was not publicly known, and they were not quite sick, had yet the distemper upon them; and who, by having an uninterrupted liberty to go about, but being obliged still to conceal their circumstances, or perhaps not knowing it themselves, gave the distemper to others, and spread the infection in a dreadful manner, as I shall explain farther hereafter.

And here I may be able to make an observation or two of my own, which may be of use hereafter to those into whose hands this may come, if they should ever see the like dreadful visitation. First, the infection generally came into the houses of the citizens by the means of their servants, whom they were obliged to send up and down the streets for necessaries, that is to say, for food or physic; to bake-houses, brew-houses, shops, &c., and who, going necessarily through the streets into shops, markets, and the like, it was impossible but that they should, one way or other, meet with distempered people, who conveyed the fatal breath into them, and they brought it home to the families to which they belonged. Secondly, it was a great mistake, that such a great city as this had but one Pest-house; for had there been, instead of one Pest-house, viz. beyond

Bunhill-fields, where, at most, they could receive perhaps 200 or 300 people; I say, had there, instead of that one, been several Pest-houses,* every one able to contain a thousand people without lying two in a bed, or two beds in a room; and had every master of a family as soon as any servant (especially) had been taken sick in his house, been obliged to send them to the next Pest-house, if they were willing, as many were, and had the examiners done the like among the poor people, when any had been stricken with the infection,—I say, had this been done where the people were willing (not otherwise), and the houses not been shut, I am persuaded, and was all the while of that opinion, that not so many, by several thousands, had died; for it was observed, and I could give several instances within the compass of my own knowledge, that where a servant had been taken sick, and the family had either time to send him out, or retire from the house, and leave the sick person, as I have said above, they were all preserved; whereas, when upon one or more sickening in a family, the house has been shut up, the whole family have perished, and the bearers been obliged to go in to fetch out the dead bodies, none being able to bring them to the door; and at last none left to do it.

This put it out of the question to me, that the calamity was spread by infection, that is to say, by some certain steams, or fumes, which the physicians call Effluvia; by the breath, or by the sweat, or by the stench of the sores of the sick persons, or some other way, perhaps, beyond even the reach of the physicians themselves; which Effluvia affected the sound who came within certain distances of the sick, immediately penetrating the vital parts of the said sound persons, putting their blood into an immediate ferment, and agitating their spirits to that degree to which it was found they were agitated; and so those newly-infected persons communicated it in the same manner to others. This I shall give some instances of, that cannot but convince those who seriously consider it; and I cannot but with some wonder find some people, now the contagion is over, talk of its being an immediate stroke from Heaven, without the agency of means, having commission to strike this and that particular person, and none other; which I look upon with contempt, as the effect of manifest ignorance and enthusiasm. So likewise of the opinion of others, who talk of infection being carried on by the air only, by carrying with it vast numbers of insects, and invisible creatures, who enter into the body with the breath, or even at the pores with the air, and there generate, or emit most acute poisons, or poisonous ova, or eggs, which mingle themselves with the blood, and so infect the body;—a discourse full of learned simplicity, and manifested to be so by universal experience; but I shall say more to this case in its order.*

* Dr. Hodges mentions Father Kircher as having adduced experiments, probably microscopical, in proof of the theory which ascribes the Plague to the presence of minute insects; but he adds, "I must ingenuously confess, that notwithstanding the most careful and industrious attempts, by all means likely to promote the discovery of such matter, and that I have had as good opportunities for this purpose as any physician, it hath not yet been my happiness (if such minute insect caused this pest) to discern them, neither have I hitherto, by the information of credible testimonies, received satisfaction in this point."—Letter to a Person of Quality, p. 15, 16. Sir R. Blackmore very properly observes that if worms or animalcula are found in ulcers produced by the Plague, they should be regarded "by no means as the cause, but the effect of pestilential putrefaction."—Discourse on the Plague, p. 36.

In Birch's "History of the Royal Society," (vol. ii. p. 69,) it is stated from Dr. Charleton's relation, that the notion concerning the vermination of the air as the cause of the Plague, first started in England by

I must here take farther notice that nothing was more fatal to the inhabitants of this city than the supine negligence of the people themselves, who during the long notice or warning they had of the visitation, yet made no provision for it, by laying in stores of provisions, or of other necessaries, by which they might have lived retired, and within their own houses, as I observed others did, and who were in a great measure preserved by that caution; nor were they, after they were a little hardened to it, so shy of conversing with one another, when actually infected, as they were at first; no though they knew it.

I acknowledge I was one of those thoughtless ones that had made so little provision, that my servants were obliged to go out of doors to buy every trifle by penny and half-penny, just as before it begun, even till my experience showing me the folly, I began to be wiser so late, that I had scarce time to store myself sufficient for our common subsistence for a month.

I had in family only an ancient woman, who managed the house, a maid-servant, two apprentices, and myself; and the Plague beginning to increase about us, I had many sad thoughts about what course I should take, and how I should act. The many dismal objects which happened every where as I went about the streets, had filled my mind with a great deal of horror, for fear of the Distemper itself, which was, indeed, very horrible in itself, and in some more than in others: the swellings, which were generally in the neck or groin, when they grew hard, and would not break, grew so painful, that it was equal to the most exquisite torture; and some, not able to bear the torment, threw themselves out at windows, or shot themselves, or otherwise made themselves away, and I saw several dismal objects of that kind; others, unable to contain themselves, vented their pain by incessant roaring, and such loud and lamentable cries were to be heard as we walked along the streets, that would pierce the very heart to think of, especially when it was to be considered that the same dreadful scourge might be expected every moment to seize upon ourselves.

Sir George Ent, afterwards managed in Italy by Father Kircher, was so much farther advanced there that, by the relation of Dr. Bacon (who had long practised physic at Rome) it had been observed there, that there was a kind of insect in the air which, being put upon a man's hand, would lay eggs hardly discernible without the aid of a microscope, which eggs, being for an experiment given to be snuffed up by a dog, the dog fell into a distemper accompanied by all the symptoms of the Plague! As this strange tale was not heard without some indications of disbelief among the members present, the relater offered to bring Dr. Bacon to give a full and punctual account of this matter."

I cannot say but that now I began to faint in my resolutions; my heart failed me very much, and sorely I repented of my rashness. When I had been out, and met with such terrible things as these I have talked of,—I say I repented my rashness in venturing to abide in town: I wished often that I had not taken upon me to stay, but had gone away with my brother and his family.

Terrified by those frightful objects, I would retire home sometimes, and resolve to go out no more, and perhaps I would keep those resolutions for three or four days, which time I spent in the most serious thankfulness for my preservation, and the preservation of my family, and the constant confession of my sins, giving myself up to God every day, and applying to him, with fasting, humiliation, and meditation. Such intervals as I had, I employed in reading books, and in writing down my memorandums of what occurred to me every day, and out of which afterwards I took most of this work, as it relates to my observations without doors. What I wrote of my private meditations, I reserve for private use, and desire it may not be made public on any account whatever.

I also wrote other meditations upon divine subjects, such as occurred to me at that time, and were profitable to myself, but not fit for any other view, and therefore I say no more of that.

I had a very good friend, a physician, whose name was Heath, whom I frequently visited during this dismal time, and to whose advice I was very much obliged for many things which he directed me to take, by way of preventing the infection when I went out, as he found I frequently did, and to hold in my mouth when I was in the streets, he also came very often to see me, and as he was a good Christian as well as a good physician, his agreeable conversation was a very great support to me in the worst of this terrible time.*

It was now the beginning of August, and the Plague grew very violent and terrible in the place where I lived, and Dr. Heath coming to visit me, and finding that I ventured so often out in the streets, earnestly persuaded me to lock myself up and my family, and not to suffer any of us to go out of doors; to keep all our windows fast, shutters and curtains close, and never to open them; but first, to make a very strong smoke in the room, where the window or door was to be opened, with resin and pitch, brimstone or gunpowder, and the like; and we did this for some time. But as I had not laid in a store of provision for such a retreat, it was impossible that we could keep within doors entirely; however, I attempted, though it was so very late, to do something towards it. And first, as I had convenience both for brewing and baking, I went and bought two sacks of meal, and for several weeks, having an oven, we baked all our own bread; also I bought malt, and brewed as much beer as all the casks I had would hold, and which seemed enough to serve my house for five or six weeks; also I laid in a quantity of salt butter and Cheshire cheese; but I had no flesh-meat, and the Plague raged so violently among the butchers, and the slaughter-houses, on the other side of our street, where they are known to dwell in great numbers, that it was not advisable so much as to go over the street among them.

And here I must observe again, that this necessity of going out of our houses to buy provisions, was in a great measure the ruin of the whole City, for the people caught the distemper, on these occasions, one of another, and even the provisions themselves were often tainted, at least I have great reason to believe so; and, therefore, I cannot say with satisfaction what I know is repeated with great assurance, that the market-people, and such as brought provisions to town were never infected. I am certain that the butchers of Whitechapel, where the greatest part of the flesh-meat was killed, were dreadfully visited, and that, at last, to such a degree, that few of their shops were left open;—and those that remained of them, killed their meat at Mile-End and that way, and brought it to market upon horses.

However, the poor people could not lay up provisions, and there was a necessity that they must go to market to buy, and others to send servants or their children; and as this was a necessity which renewed itself daily, it brought abundance of unsound people to the markets, and a great many that went thither sound brought home death with them.

It is true, people used all possible precaution ; when any bought a joint of meat in the market, they would not take it of the butcher's hand, but take it off the hooks themselves. On the other hand, the butcher would not touch the money, but have it put in a pot full of vinegar which he kept for that purpose. The buyers carried always small money to make up any odd sum, that they might take no small change. They carried bottles for scents and perfumes in their hands, and all the means that could be used, were used ; but then the poor could not do even these things, and they went at all hazards.

Innumerable dismal stories we heard every day on this very account ; sometimes a man or woman dropt down dead in the very markets ; for many people that had the Plague upon them, knew nothing of it till the inward gangreen had affected their vitals, and they died in a few moments : this caused, that many died frequently in that manner in the streets suddenly, without any warning ; * others, perhaps, had time to go to the next bulk or stall, or to any door, or porch, and just sit down and die, as I have said before.

These objects were so frequent in the streets, that when the Plague came to be very raging on one side, there was scarce any passing by the streets, but that several dead bodies would be lying here and there upon the ground ; on the other hand it is observable, that though, at first, the people would stop as they went along, and call to the neighbours to come out on such an occasion, yet, afterward, no notice was taken of them ; but if at any time we found a corpse lying, we would go across the way, and not come near it; or, if in a narrow lane or passage, go back again, and seek some other way to go on the business we were upon: and, in those cases, the corpse was always left till the officers had notice to come and take them away; or, till night, when the bearers attending the dead-cart, would take them up and carry them away. Nor did these undaunted creatures, who performed these offices, fail to search their pockets, and sometimes strip off the clothes, if they were well drest, as sometimes they were, and carry off what they could get.

* This is hardly possible to be true ; for though the infection might be sudden, and its progress rapid, yet that it should be thus mortal without the deceased knowing anything of the seizure, is contrary to all analogy.

But to return to the markets; the butchers took that care, that if any persons died in the market, they had the officers always at hand to take them upon hand-barrows, and carry them to the next church-yard; and this was so frequent that such were not entered in the weekly bill, "found dead in the streets, or fields," as is the case now; but they went into the general articles of the great distemper.

But now the fury of the distemper increased to such a degree, that even the markets were but very thinly furnished with provisions, or frequented with buyers, compared to what they were before; and the Lord Mayor caused the country people who brought provisions, to be stopped in the streets leading into the town, and to sit down there with their goods, where they sold what they brought, and went immediately away, and this encouraged the country people greatly to do so, for they sold their provisions at the very entrances into the town, and even in the fields; as particularly in the fields beyond White-chapel, in Spittle-fields. Note, those streets now called Spittle-fields, were then indeed open Fields.—Also in St. George's-fields in Southwark, in Bunhill-fields, and in a great field called Wood's-close, near Islington.* Thither the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Magistrates, sent their officers and servants to buy for their families, themselves keeping within doors as much as possible; and the like did many other people: and after this method was taken, the country people came with great cheerfulness, and brought provisions of all sorts, and very seldom got any harm; which, I suppose, added also to that report of their being miraculously preserved.†

As for my little family, having thus, as I have said, laid in a store of bread, butter, cheese, and beer, I took my friend and physician's advice, and locked myself up, and my family, and resolved to suffer the hardship of living a few months without flesh-meat, rather than to purchase it at the hazard of our lives.

But though I confined my family, I could not prevail upon my own unsatisfied curiosity to stay within entirely, myself; and though I generally came frightened and terri-

† In the "Intelligencer," No. 55, Sir R. L'Estrange announces that, "Since it has pleased God to visit this town, city, and other parts adjoining with the sad and heavy judgment of the Plague and Pestilence, it has been made a great part of many people's business, by misreports and false suggestions, to lay the stress in the wrong place, and so cut off all communication and correspondence with this City. For prevention whereof for the future, I have," says he, "received an Order and Command to render from time to time such an account thereof, as may briefly satisfy the world in the main, without overcharging them with particulars.

"There died this last week (ending July 11th,) within the bounds of the ordinary Bills of Mortality, 725 persons of the Plague, whereof but twenty-eight within the walls of London. So that (God be praised) the disease is not yet either so planted in the City, or so universal in the Suburbs, as the rumour has made it. Yet such is the care of the Right Hon. Lord Mayor, that for the more effectual security of the countries which shall continue an intercourse with this City, his Lordship is taking a course that a strict inspection shall be had within the City and Liberties of all goods that shall henceforth be brought to the country carriers and waggons that nothing be either delivered or received from any infected Place or Person."

fied home, yet I could not refrain: only that, indeed, I did not do it so frequently as at first.

I had some little obligations indeed upon me, to go to my brother's house, which was in Coleman-street parish, and which he had left to my care, and I went at first every day, but afterwards only once or twice a week.

In these walks, I had many dismal scenes before my eyes, as particularly of persons falling dead in the streets, terrible shrieks and screechings of women, who in their agonies would throw open their chamber windows, and cry out in a dismal surprising manner; it is impossible to describe the variety of postures in which the passions of the poor people would express themselves.

Passing through Token-house Yard, in Lothbury, of a sudden a casement violently opened just over my head, and a woman gave three frightful screeches, and then cried, "Oh! Death, Death, Death!" in a most inimitable tone, and which struck me with horror and a chilness in my very blood. There was nobody to be seen in the whole street, neither did any other window open; for people had no curiosity now in any case; nor could anybody help one another; so I went on to pass into Bell-Alley.

Just in Bell-Alley, on the right hand of the passage, there was a more terrible cry than that, though it was not so directed out at the window, but the whole family was in a terrible fright, and I could hear women and children run screaming about the rooms like distracted, when a garret window opened, and somebody from a window on the other side the alley, called and asked, "What is the matter?" upon which, from the first window it was answered, "O Lord, my old master has hanged himself!" The other asked again, "Is he quite dead?" and the first answered, "Ay, ay, quite dead; quite dead and cold!" This person was a merchant, and a deputy alderman, and very rich. I care not to mention his name, though I knew his name too, but that would be an hardship to the family, which is now flourishing again.

But this is but one; it is scarce credible what dreadful cases happened in particular families every day. People in the rage of the distemper, or in the torment of their swellings, which was indeed intolerable, running out of their own government, raving and distracted, and oftentimes laying violent hands upon themselves, throwing themselves out at their windows, shooting themselves, &c. Mothers murdering their own children, in their lunacy. Some dying of mere grief, as a passion; some of mere fright and surprise, without any infection at all; others frightened into idiotism and foolish distractions; some into despair and lunacy; others into melancholy madness.

The pain of the swelling was in particular very violent, and to some intolerable. The physicians and surgeons may be said to have tortured many poor creatures, even to death: the swellings in some grew hard, and they applied violent drawing plasters, or poultices, to break them; and if these did not do, they cut and scarified them in a terrible manner. In some, those swellings were made hard, partly by the force of the distemper, and partly by their being too violently drawn, and were so hard that no instrument could cut them, and then they burnt them with caustics, so that many died raving mad with the torment; and some in the very operation. In these distresses, some for want of help to hold them down in their beds, or to look to them, laid hands upon themselves, as above. Some broke out into the streets, perhaps naked, and would run directly down to the river, if

It often pierced my very soul to hear the groans and cries of those who were thus tormented, but of the two, this was counted the most promising particular in the whole infection; for, if these swellings could be brought to a head, and to break and run, or, as the surgeons call it, to digest, the patient generally recovered; whereas those, who, like the gentlewoman's daughter, † were struck with death at the beginning, and had the tokens come out upon them, often went about indifferent easy, till a little before they died, and some till the moment they dropped down, as in apoplexies and epilepsies is often the case; such would be taken suddenly very sick, and would run to a bench or bulk, or any convenient place that offered itself, or to their own houses, if possible, as I mentioned before, and there sit down, grow faint and die. This kind of dying was much the same as it was with those who die of common mortifications, who die swooning, and, as it were, go away in a dream : such as died thus had very little notice of their being infected at all, till the gangrene was spread through their whole body ; nor could physicians themselves know certainly how it was with them, till they opened their breasts or other parts of their body, and saw the tokens.

* An affecting instance of the ungovernable frenzy which at times infuriated the diseased, is given in the Tract mentioned in a former note on the "Shutting up of infected Houses."—"For another argument," says the writer, "I allege the mischief and sad consequence that may arise from the high fits of frenzy that usually attend this and all other the like distempers; wherein the sick (if not restrained by main force of their attendants) are ready to commit any violence either upon themselves or others, whether wife, mother, or child. A sad instance whereof we had this last week in Fleet-lane, where the man of the house being sick, and having a great swelling, but not without hope of being almost ripe for breaking, did in a strong fit rise almost out of his bed, in spite of all that his wife, who attended him, could do to the contrary; got his knife, and therewith most miserably cut his wife, and had killed her had she not wrapped up the sheet about her, and therewith saved herself, till by crying out 'murder!' a neighbour (who was himself shut up) opened his own doors, and forced into the house, and came seasonably to her preservation. The man is since dead, when in all likelihood (had he not by rising struck in the disease) he might have recovered."

We had at this time a great many frightful stories told us of nurses and watchmen, who looked after the dying people ; that is to say, of hired nurses, who attended infected people, using them barbarously, starving them, smothering them, or by other wicked means hastening their end, that is to say, murdering of them : and of watchmen being set to guard houses that were shut up, when there has been but one person left, and perhaps that one lying sick, that they have broke in and murdered that body, and immediately thrown them out into the dead cart ! and so they have gone scarce cold to the grave.

I cannot say but that some murders were committed, and I think two were sent to prison for it, but died before they could be tried ; and I have heard that three others, at several times, were executed for murders of that kind ; but I must say, I believe nothing of its being so common a crime as some have since been pleased to say ; nor does it seem to be rational that it should be so, where the people were brought so low as not to be able to help themselves (for such seldom recovered), and there was no temptation to commit a murder, at least, none equal to the fact, where they were sure persons would die in so short a time ; and could not live.

That there were a great many robberies and wicked practices committed even in this dreadful time I do not deny. The power of avarice was so strong in some, that they would run any hazard to steal and to plunder ; and particularly in houses where all the families or inhabitants have been dead, and carried out, they would break in at all hazards, and without regard to the danger of infection, take even the clothes off the dead bodies, and the bed-clothes from others where they lay dead.*

This, I suppose, must be [~~have~~ been] the case of a family in Houndsditch, where a man and his daughter (the rest of the family being, as I suppose, carried away before, by the dead-cart) were found stark naked, one in one chamber, and one in another, lying dead on the floor; and the clothes of the beds (from whence 'tis supposed they were rolled off by thieves) stolen, and carried quite away.

It is indeed to be observed, that the women were, in all this calamity, the most rash, fearless, and desperate creatures; and as there were vast numbers that went about as nurses, to tend those that were sick, they committed a great many petty thieveries in the houses where they were employed; and some of them were publicly whipped for it, when perhaps they ought rather to have been hanged for examples: for numbers of houses were robbed on these occasions, till at length the parish officers were sent to recommend nurses to the sick, and always took an account who it was they sent, so as that they might call them to account, if the house had been abused where they were placed.

But these robberies extended chiefly to wearing clothes, linen, and what rings or money they could come at, when the person died who was under their care, but not to a general plunder of the houses; and I could give you an account of one of these nurses, who, several years after, being on her death-bed, confessed with the utmost horror the robberies she had committed at the time of her being a nurse, and by which she had enriched herself to a great degree; but, as for murders, I do not find that there was ever any proof of the facts, in the manner as it has been reported, except as above.

* Dr. Hodges's work confirms the stories of the dishonesty and rapacity of nurses, and he mentions one who was found dead with a bundle of stolen property, which she had just plundered, lying by her.—"Loimologia," p. x. edit. 1671.—De Foe, however, in the above paragraph, has inconsistently stated, that the bodies of the dead were stripped by plunderers, even in those houses from which they had "all been carried out."

They did tell me, indeed, of a nurse in one place, that laid a wet cloth upon the face of a dying patient whom she tended, and so put an end to his life, who was just expiring before; and of another that smothered a young woman she was looking to, when she was in a fainting fit, and would have come to herself: some that killed them by giving them one thing, some another, and some starved them by giving them nothing at all. But these stories had two marks of suspicion that always attended them, which caused me always to slight them, and to look on them as mere stories, that people continually frightened one another with. First—That wherever it was that we heard it, they always place the scene at the farther end of the town, opposite or most remote from where you were to hear it. If you heard it in Whitechapel, it had happened at St. Giles's, or at Westminster, or Holborn, or that end of the town; if you heard of it at that end of the town, then it was done in Whitechapel, or the Minories, or about Cripple-gate parish; if you heard of it in the City, why, then it happened in Southwark; and if you heard of it in Southwark, then it was done in the City, and the like.

In the next place, of what part soever you heard the story, the particulars were always the same, especially that of laying a wet double clout on a dying man's face,* and that of smothering a young gentlewoman: so that it was apparent, at least to my judgment, that there was more of tale than of truth in those things.

However, I cannot say, but it had some effect upon the people; and particularly, that, as I said before, they grew more cautious who they took into their houses, and who they trusted their lives with, and had them always recommended if they could; and where they could not find such, for they were not very plenty, they applied to the parish officers.

But here again, the misery of that time lay upon the poor, who, being infected, had neither food nor physic; neither physician nor apothecary to assist them, nor nurse to attend them. Many of those died calling for help, and even for sustenance, out at their windows, in a most miserable and deplorable manner; but it must be added, that whenever the cases of such persons or families were represented to my Lord Mayor, they always were relieved.

It is true, that in some houses where the people were not very poor, yet, where they had sent perhaps their wives and children away (and if they had any servants, they had been dismissed); I say, it is true, that to save the expenses, many such as these shut themselves in, and, not having help, died alone.

A neighbour and acquaintance of mine, having some money owing to him from a shopkeeper in Whitecross-street, or thereabouts, sent his apprentice, a youth about eighteen years of age, to endeavour to get the money. He came to the door, and finding it shut, knocked pretty hard, and, as he thought, heard somebody answer within, but was not sure, so he waited, and after some stay, knocked again, and then a third time, when he heard somebody coming down stairs.

* This method of committing assassinations seems to be derived from the story of Hazael and Ben-hadad in the 2nd Book of Kings:—"And it came to pass on the morrow, that he took a thick cloth and dipped it in water, and spread it on his face, so that he died."—Vide chap. viii. v. 15.—The ingenious author of "Brambletye House" has made great use of this, and other parts of De Foe's narrative, in the concluding volume of that interesting novel.

At length, the man of the house came to the door: he had on his breeches or drawers, and a yellow flannel waistcoat; no stockings, a pair of slipt-shoes, a white cap on his head, and, as the young man said, "death in his face."

When he opened the door, says he, "What do you disturb me thus for?" The boy, though a little surprised, replied, "I come from such a one, and my master sent me for the money which he says you know of." "Very well, child," returns the living ghost, "call as you go by, at Cripple-gate church, and bid them ring the bell;" and with these words he shut the door again, and went up again, and died the same day; nay, perhaps the same hour. This the young man told me himself, and I have reason to believe it. This was while the Plague was not come to a height. I think it was in June, towards the latter end of the month; it must be before the dead carts came about, and while they used the ceremony of ringing the bell for the dead, which was over for certain, in that parish at least, before the month of July; for by the 25th of July, there died 550 and upwards in a week, and then they could no more bury in form, rich or poor.

I have mentioned above, that notwithstanding this dreadful calamity, yet numbers of thieves were abroad upon all occasions, where they had found any prey, and that these were generally women. It was one morning, about eleven o'clock, I had walked out to my brother's house, in Coleman-street parish, as I often did, to see that all was safe.

My brother's house had a little court before it, and a brick wall and a gate in it, and within that several warehouses, where his goods of several sorts lay. It happened that in one of these warehouses were several packs of women's high-crowned hats, which came out of the country, and were, as I suppose, for exportation; whither, I know not.

I was surprised that when I came near my brother's door, which was in a place they called Swan-alley, I met three or four women with high-crowned hats on their heads; and as I remembered afterwards, one, if not more, had some hats likewise in their hands; but as I did not see them come out at my brother's door, and not knowing that my brother had any such goods in his warehouse, I did not offer to say anything to them, but went across the way to shun meeting them, as was usual to do at that time for fear of the Plague. But when I came near to the gate, I met another woman with more hats coming out of the gate. "What business, Mistress," said I, "have you had there?" "There are more people there," said she, "I have had no more business there than they." I was hasty to get to the gate then, and said no more to her; by which means she got away. But just as I came to the gate, I saw two more coming across the yard, to come out, with hats also on their heads and under their arms; at which I threw the gate to behind me, which, having a spring lock fastened itself; and turning to the women,—"Forsooth," said I, "what are you doing here?" and seized upon the hats and took them from them. One of them who, I confess, did not look like a thief—"Indeed," says she, "we are wrong; but we were told they were goods that had no owner; be pleased to take them again, and look yonder, there are more such customers as we." She cried and looked pitifully, so I took the hats from her, and opened the gate and bade them begone, for I pitied the women indeed; but when I looked towards the warehouse as she directed, there were six or seven more, all women, fitting themselves with hats, as unconcerned and quiet as if they had been at a hatter's shop buying for their money.

I was surprised, not at the sight of so many thieves only, but at the circumstances I was in; being now to thrust myself in among so many people, who, for some weeks had been so shy of myself, that if I met anybody in the street, I would cross the way from them.

They were equally surprised, though on another account; they all told me they were neighbours, that they had heard any one might take them, that they were nobody's goods, and the like. I talked big to them at first; went back to the gate and took out the key; so that they were all my prisoners; threatened to lock them all into the warehouse, and go and fetch my Lord Mayor's officers for them.

They begged heartily, protested they found the gate open, and the warehouse door open; and that it had, no doubt, been broken open by some who expected to find goods of greater value, which indeed, was reasonable to believe, because the lock was broke, and a padlock that hung to the door on the outside also loose; and not abundance of the hats carried away.

At length, I considered that this was not a time to be cruel and vigorous; and besides that, it would necessarily oblige me to go much about, to have several people come to me, and I go to several, whose circumstances of health

I knew nothing of: and that, even at this time, the Plague was so high, as that there died 4000 a week; so that, in showing my resentment, or even in seeking justice for my brother's goods, I might lose my own life. So I contented myself with taking the names and places where some of them lived who were really inhabitants of the neighbourhood; and threatening that my brother should call them to an account for it when he returned to his habitation.

Then I talked a little upon another foot with them; and asked them how they could do such things as these in a time of such general calamity, and as it were, in the face of God's most dreadful judgments, when the Plague was at their very doors, and it may be in their very houses; and they did not know but that the dead-cart might stop at their doors in a few hours to carry them to their graves.

I could not perceive that my discourse made much impression upon them all that while, till it happened that there came two men of the neighbourhood, hearing of the disturbance, and knowing my brother, for they had both been dependants upon his family, and they came to my assistance; these being, as I said, neighbours, presently knew three of the women, and told me who they were and where they lived; and it seems they had given me a true account of themselves before.

This brings these two men to a farther remembrance. The name of one was John Hayward, who was at that time under-sexton of the parish of St. Stephen, Coleman-street; by under-sexton was understood at that time grave-digger and bearer of the dead. This man carried, or assisted to carry, all the dead to their graves, which were buried in that large parish, and who were carried in form; and after that form of burying was stopped, he went with the dead-cart and the bell, to fetch the dead bodies from the houses where they lay, and fetched many of them out of the chambers and houses: for the parish was, and is still, remarkable, particularly above all the parishes in London, for a great number of alleys and thoroughfares, very long, into which no carts could come, and where they were obliged to go and fetch the bodies a very long way; which alleys now remain to witness it; such as White's-alley, Crosskey-court, Swan-alley, Bell-alley, White-horse-alley, and many more. Here they went with a kind of handbarrow, and laid the dead bodies on it, and carried them out to the carts; which work he performed, and never had the distemper at all, but lived about twenty years after it, and was sexton of the parish to the time of his death. His wife at the same time was a nurse to infected people, and tended many that died in the parish, being, for her honesty, recommended by the parish officers, yet she never was infected neither.

He never used any preservative against the infection, other than holding garlick and rue in his mouth, and smoking tobacco; this I also had from his own mouth: and his wife's remedy was washing her head in vinegar, and sprinkling her head-clothes so with vinegar as to keep them always moist; and if the smell of any of those she waited on was more than ordinarily offensive, she snuffed vinegar up her nose, and sprinkled vinegar upon her head-clothes, and held a handkerchief wetted with vinegar to her mouth.

It must be confessed, that though the Plague was chiefly among the poor, yet were the poor the most venturous and fearless of it, and went about their employment with a sort of brutal courage; I must call it so, for it was founded neither on religion nor prudence ; scarce did they use any caution, but run into any business which they could get employment in, though it was the most hazardous : such was that of tending the sick, watching houses shut up, carrying infected persons to the Pest-house, and which was still worse, carrying the dead away to their graves.

It was under this John Hayward's care, and within his bounds, that the story of the Piper, with which people have made themselves so merry, happened, and he assured me that it was true. It is said that he was a blind piper ; but, as John told me, the fellow was not blind, but an ignorant weak poor man, and usually walked his rounds about ten o'clock at night, and went piping along from door to door, and people usually took him in at public-houses where they knew him, and would give him drink and victuals, and sometimes farthings ; and he, in return, would pipe and sing, and talk simply, which diverted the people ; and thus he lived. It was but a very bad time for this diversion, while things were as I have told ; yet the poor fellow went about as usual, but was almost starved ; and when anybody asked how he did, he would answer,—the dead-cart had not taken him yet, but that they had promised to call for him next week.

It happened one night, that this poor fellow, whether somebody had given him too much drink or no,—John Hayward said, he had not drink in his house, but that they had given him a little more victuals than ordinary at a public-house in Coleman-street ; and the poor fellow, having not usually had a bellyful, or, perhaps, not a good while, was laid all along on the top of a bulk or stall, and fast asleep, at a door, in the street near London-wall, towards Cripplegate ; and that upon the same bulk or stall, the people of some house, in the alley of which the house was a corner, hearing a bell, which they always rung before the cart came, had laid a body really dead of the Plague just by him; thinking, too, that this poor fellow had been a dead body, as the other was, and laid there by some of the neighbours.

Accordingly, when John Hayward, with his bell and the cart, came along, finding two dead bodies lie upon the stall, they took them up with the instrument they used, and threw them into the cart, and all this while the piper slept soundly.

From hence they passed along, and took in other dead bodies, till, as honest John Hayward told me, they almost buried him alive in the cart; yet all this while he slept soundly; at length the cart came to the place where the bodies were to be thrown into the ground, which as I do remember, was at Mount-mill;* and as the cart usually stopped some time before they were ready to shoot out the melancholy load they had in it, as soon as the cart stopped, the fellow awaked, and struggled a little to get his head out from among the dead bodies, when raising himself up in the cart, he called out,—“Hey! where am I?”—This frightened the fellow that attended about the work; but after some pause, John Hayward, recovering himself, said,—“Lord bless us! there is somebody in the cart not quite dead!” So another called to him and said—“Who are you?” The fellow answered—“I am the poor piper. Where am I?” “Where are you?” says Hayward; “why, you are in the dead-cart, and we are going to bury you.” “But I an’t dead, though, am I?” says the piper, which made them laugh a little, though, as * Mount-mill stood on the east side of what is now called Goswell-street, and nearly opposite the end of King-street.

John said, they were heartily frightened at first; so they helped the poor fellow down, and he went about his business.

I know the story goes, that he set up his pipes in the cart, and frightened the bearers and others, so that they ran away; but John Hayward did not tell the story so, nor say anything of his piping at all; but that he was a poor piper, and that he was carried away, as above, I am fully satisfied of the truth of.

It is to be noted here, that the dead-carts in the city were not confined to particular parishes, but one cart went through several parishes, according as the numbers of dead presented; nor were they tied to carry the dead to their respective parishes, but many of the dead taken up in the city were carried to the burying-ground in the out-parts, for want of room.

I have already mentioned the surprise that this judgment was, at first, the occasion of among the people. I must be allowed to give some of my observations on the more serious and religious part. Surely never city, at least of this bulk and magnitude, was taken in a condition so perfectly unprepared for such a dreadful visitation, whether I am to speak of the civil preparations, or religious; they were, indeed, as if they had had no warning, no expectation, no apprehensions, and, consequently, the least provision imaginable was made for it in a public way; for example:—

The Lord Mayor and Sheriffs had made no provision as magistrates for the regulations which were to be observed: they had gone into no measures for the relief of the poor.

The citizens had no public magazines, or store-houses for corn or meal, for the subsistence of the poor; which, if had they provided themselves with, as in such cases is done abroad, many miserable families, who were now reduced to the utmost distress, would have been relieved, and that in a better manner than now could be done.

The stock of the city's money I can say but little to; the chamber of London was said to be exceeding rich; and it may be concluded that they were so, by the vast sums of money issued from thence, in the rebuilding the public edifices after the fire of London, and in building new works, such as, for the first part, the Guildhall, Blackwell-hall, part of Leaden-hall, half the Exchange, the Session-house, the Compter, the prisons of Ludgate, Newgate, &c.; several of the wharfs and stairs, and landing-places on the river; all which were either burnt down or damaged by the great fire of London, the next year after the Plague; and of the second sort, the Monument, Fleet-ditch, with its bridges, and the Hospital of Bethlem, or Bedlam, &c. But possibly the managers of the city's credit at that time made more conscience of breaking in upon the orphan's money, to show charity to the distressed citizens, than the managers in the following years did, to beautify the city, and re-edify the buildings, though in the first case the losers would have thought their fortunes better bestowed and the public faith of the city have been less subjected to scandal and reproach.

It must be acknowledged, that the absent citizens, who, though they were fled for safety into the country, were yet greatly interested in the welfare of those whom they left behind, forgot not to contribute liberally to the relief of the poor, and large sums were also collected among trading towns in the remotest parts of England; and as I have heard also, the nobility and the gentry, in all parts of England, took the deplorable condition of the city into their consideration, and sent up large sums of money, in charity, to the Lord Mayor and magistrates, for the relief of the poor. The king also, as I was told, ordered a thousand pounds a-week to be distributed in four parts: one quarter to the city and liberties of Westminster; one quarter, or part, among the inhabitants of the Southwark side of the water; one quarter to the Liberties and parts without of the city, exclusive of the city within the walls; and one-fourth part to the suburbs in the county of Middlesex, and the east and north parts of the city: but this latter I only speak of as a report.*

Certain it is, the greatest part of the poor, or families who formerly lived by their labour, or by retail trade, lived now on charity; and had there not been prodigious sums of money given by charitable well-minded Christians, for the support of such, the city could never have subsisted. There were, no question, accounts kept of their charity, and of the just distribution of it by the magistrates: but as such multitudes of those very officers died, through whose hands it was distributed; and also that, as I have been told, most of the accounts of those things were lost in the great fire which happened in the very next year, and which burnt even the chamberlain's office, and many of their papers; so I could never come at the particular account, which I used great endeavours to have seen.

It may, however, be a direction in case of the approach of a like visitation, which God keep the city from!—I say, it may be of use to observe, that by the care of the Lord Mayor and aldermen, at that time, in distributing weekly great sums of money for relief of the poor, a multitude of people, who would otherwise have perished, were relieved, and their lives preserved. And here let me enter into a brief state of the case of the poor at that time, and what was apprehended from them, from whence may be judged hereafter what may be expected, if the like distress should come upon the city.

At the beginning of the plague, when there was now no more hope, but that the whole city would be visited; when, as I have said, all that had friends or estates in the country, retired with their families; and when, indeed, one would have thought the very city itself was running out of the gates, and that there would be nobody left behind; you may be sure from that hour all trade, except such as related to immediate subsistence, was, as it were, at a full stop.*

* Lord Clarendon (in his History of his own Life, which was bequeathed by his heirs to the University of Oxford, and printed at the Clarendon Press, in 1759), when speaking of the year 1665, says:—"There began now to appear another enemy, much more formidable than the Dutch, and more difficult to be struggled with: which was the Plague, that brake out in the winter, and made such an early progress in the spring, that though the weekly numbers did not rise high, and it appeared to be only in the outskirts of the town, and in the most obscure alleys, amongst the poorest people; yet the ancient men, who well remembered in what manner the last great plague (which had been near forty years before) first brake out, and the progress it afterwards made, foretold a terrible summer, and many of them removed their families out of the city to country habitations; when their neighbours laughed at their providence, and thought they might have stayed without danger, but they found shortly that they had done wisely." He next states, but with some incorrectness, that,—"the King prorogued the Parliament in April till September following, his Majesty declaring that, if it pleased God to extinguish or allay the fierceness of the plague, he should be glad to meet them then,—but if that visitation increased, they should have notice by proclamation, that they might not hazard themselves." Vide "Life of Edward, Earl of Clarendon:" Continuation, pp. 249, 250. The Parliament was prorogued till June, (and not till September,) and then again till August; and lastly, till October, when it met at Oxford.

This is so lively a case, and contains in it so much of the real condition of the people, that I think I cannot be too particular in it; and therefore I descend to the several arrangements or classes of people, who fell into immediate distress upon this occasion. For example:—

- 1.—All Master-workmen in manufactories: especially such as belonged to ornament, and the less necessary parts of the people's dress, clothes, and furniture for houses; such as riband weavers, and other weavers; gold and silver lace makers, and gold and silver wire drawers, sempstresses, milliners, shoe-makers, hat-makers, and glove-makers; also, upholsterers, joiners, cabinet-makers, looking-glass-makers, and innumerable trades which depend upon such as these; I say the master-workmen in such stopped their work, dismissed their journeymen and workmen, and all their dependants.
- 2.—As Merchandizing was at a full stop, for very few ships ventured to come up the river, and none at all went out; so all the extraordinary officers of the customs, likewise the watermen, carmen, porters, and all the poor, whose labour depended upon the merchants, were at once dismissed, and put out of business.
- 3.—All the Tradesmen usually employed in building or repairing of houses, were at a full stop, for the people were far from wanting to build houses, when so many thousand houses were at once stripped of their inhabitants; so that this one article turned all the ordinary workmen of that kind out of business; such as bricklayers, masons, carpenters, joiners, plasterers, painters, glaziers, smiths, plumbers; and all the labourers depending on such.
- 4.—As Navigation was at a stop, our ships neither coming in nor going out as before, so the seamen were all out of employment, and many of them in the last and lowest degree of distress ; and with the seamen, were all the several tradesmen and workmen belonging to and depending upon the building and fitting out of ships ; such as ship-carpenters, caulkers, rope-makers, dry-coopers, sail-makers, anchor-smiths, and other smiths ; block-makers, gun-smiths, ship-chandlers, ship-carvers, and the like. The masters of those, perhaps, might live upon their substance ; but the traders were universally at a stop, and consequently all their workmen discharged. Add to these, that the river was in a manner without boats, and all or most part of the watermen, lightermen, boat-builders, and lighter-builders, in like manner idle, and laid by.

5.—All families retrenched their living as much as possible, as well those that fled as those that stayed ; so that an innumerable multitude of footmen, serving-men, shop-keepers, journeymen, merchants' book-keepers, and such sort of people, and especially poor maid-servants, were turned off ; and left friendless and helpless, without employment and without habitation ; and this was really a dismal article.

I might be more particular as to this part, but it may suffice to mention in general, that all trades being stopped, employment ceased : the labour, and by that the bread, of the poor was cut off ; and at first, indeed, the cries of the poor were most lamentable to hear, though by the distribution of charity their misery that way was greatly abated. Many, indeed, fled into the country ; but thousands of them having stayed in London till nothing but desperation sent them away, death overtook them on the road, and they served for no better than the messengers of death ; indeed, others carrying the infection-along with them, spread it very unhappily into the remotest parts of the kingdom.*

Many of these were the miserable objects of despair, which I have mentioned before, and were removed by the destruction that followed. These might be said to perish, not by the infection itself, but by the consequence of it:—namely, by hunger and distress, and the want of all things; being without lodging, without money, without friends, without means to get their bread, and without any one to give it them, for many of them were without what we call legal settlements, and so could not claim of the parishes; and all the support they had, was by application to the magistrates for relief, which relief was (to give the magistrates their due) carefully and cheerfully administered as they found it necessary; and those that stayed behind never felt the want and distress of that kind which they felt who went away in the manner above noted.

Let any one who is acquainted with what multitudes of people get their daily bread in this city by their labour, whether artificers or mere workmen; I say, let any man consider what must be the miserable condition of this town, if, on a sudden, they should be all turned out of employment, that labour should cease, and wages for work be no more.

This was the case with us at that time; and had not the sums of money, contributed in charity by well-disposed people of every kind, as well abroad as at home, * Dr. Mead (in his "Discourse concerning Pestilential Contagion,") says: "It was difficult to withdraw from London, while the country was everywhere afraid of strangers; and the inns on the road were unsafe to lodge in for those who travelled from the City, where it could not be known but infection might be received in them by others come from the same place."—This information, however, must have been communicated to the Doctor, as he himself was not born until 1673.

been prodigiously great, it had not been in the power of the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs to have kept the public peace; nor were they without apprehensions as it was, that desperation should push the people upon tumults, and cause them to rifle the houses of rich men, and plunder the markets of provisions: in which case, the country people, who brought provisions very freely and boldly to town, would have been terrified from coming any more, and the town would have sunk under an unavoidable famine.

But the prudence of my Lord Mayor and the court of Aldermen, within the city, and of the Justices of Peace in the out-parts, was such, and they were supported with money from all parts so well, that the poor people were kept quiet, and their wants everywhere relieved, as far as was possible to be done.

Two things, besides this, contributed to prevent the mob doing any mischief: one was, that really the rich themselves had not laid up stores of provisions in their houses, as, indeed, they ought to have done, and which, if they had been wise enough to have done, and locked themselves entirely up, as some few did, they had perhaps escaped the disease better; but as it appeared they had not, so the mob had no notion of finding stores of provisions there, if they had broken in, as it is plain they were sometimes very near doing, and which, if they had, they had finished the ruin of the whole city, for there were no regular troops to have withstood them; nor could the trained bands have been brought together to defend the city, no men being to be found to bear arms. But the vigilance of the Lord Mayor, and such magistrates as could be had (for some, even of the Aldermen, were dead, and some absent), prevented this; and they did it by the most kind and gentle methods they could think of, as particularly by relieving the most desperate with money, and putting others into business, and particularly that employment of watching houses that were infected and shut up; and as the number of these was very great, for, it was said, there was at one time ten thousand houses shut up; and every house had two watchmen to guard it, viz., one by night and the other by day: this gave opportunity to employ a very great number of poor men at a time.

The women and servants that were turned off from their places were likewise employed as nurses to tend the sick in all places; and this took off a very great number of them.

And which, though a melancholy article in itself, yet was a deliverance in its kind, namely, the Plague, which raged in a dreadful manner from the middle of August to the middle of October, carried off, in that time, thirty or forty thousand of these very people, who, had they been left, would certainly have been an insufferable burden, by their poverty: that is to say, the whole city could not have supported the expense of them, or have provided food for them; and they would in time have been even driven to the necessity of plundering either the city itself, or the country adjacent, to have subsisted themselves, which would, first or last, have put the whole nation, as well as the city, into the utmost terror and confusion.

It was observable then, that this calamity of the people made them very humble; for now, for about nine weeks together, there died near a thousand in a day, one day with another, even by the account of the weekly bills, which, yet I have reason to be assured, never gave a full account by many thousands; the confusion being such, and the carts working in the dark when they carried the dead, that in some places no account at all was kept, but they worked on; the clerks and sextons not attending for weeks together, and not knowing what number they carried. This account is verified by the following bills of mortality:

So that the gross of the people were carried off in these two months; for, as the whole number which was brought in to die of the Plague was but 68,590, here is 50,000 of them, within a trifle, in two months; I say 50,000, because, as there wants 295 in the number above, so there wants two days of two months in the account of time.*

Now, when I say that the parish officers did not give in a full account, or were not to be depended upon for their account, let any one but consider how men could be exact in such a time of dreadful distress, and when many of them were taken sick themselves, and perhaps died in the very time when their accounts were to be given in; I mean the parish-clerks besides inferior officers; for though these poor men ventured at all hazards, yet they were far from being exempt from the common calamity—especially if it be true that the parish of Stepney had, within the year, one hundred and sixteen sextons, grave-diggers, and

* There is a slight mistake in the above calculation; for the period from Aug. 8 to Oct. 10, manifestly exceeds two months by two days, instead of so far falling short of that time.

their assistants, that is to say, bearers, bellmen, and drivers of carts for carrying off the dead bodies.*

Indeed the work was not of a nature to allow them leisure to take an exact tale of the dead bodies, which were all huddled together in the dark into a pit; which pit or trench no man could come nigh but at the utmost peril. I observed often, that in the parishes of Aldgate and Cripplegate, Whitechapel, and Stepney, there were five, six, seven, and eight hundred in a week in the bills; whereas, if we may believe the opinion of those that lived in the city all the time, as well as I, there died sometimes 2000 a week in those parishes; and I saw it under the hand of one that made as strict an examination into that part as he could, that there really died an hundred thousand people of the Plague in it [London] that one year, whereas, in the bills, the articles of the Plague formed but 68,590.

If I may be allowed to give my opinion, by what I saw with my eyes, and heard from other people that were eye-witnesses, I do verily believe the same, viz., that there died, at least, 100,000 of the Plague only, besides other distempers, and besides those which died in the fields and highways, and secret places, out of the compass of the communication, as it was called, and who were not put down in the bills, though they really belonged to the body of the inhabitants.† It was known

* It appears from the parish register of Stepney, that 154 persons were buried there in the Plague-year in one day, on September the 11th. From the great numbers which died of the Plague, a large piece of ground on the north side of Mile-end Road, near the Dog-row, was appropriated for a burial-place. It was afterwards converted into a nursery garden, and remained so until the beginning of the present century.

† Lord Clarendon says, that "The frequent deaths of the Clerks and Sextons of Parishes, hindered the exact account of every week; but that which left it without any certainty, was the vast number that was to us all, that abundance of poor despairing creatures, who had the distemper upon them, and were grown stupid or melancholy by their misery, as many were, wandered away into the fields and woods, and into several uncouth places,—almost any where, to creep into a bush, or hedge, and DIE.

The inhabitants of the villages adjacent would, in pity, carry them food, and set it at a distance, that they might fetch it, if they were able, and sometimes they were not able; and the next time they went, they should find the poor wretches lie dead, and the food untouched. The number of these miserable objects were many, and I know so many that perished thus, and so exactly where, that I believe I could go to the very place and dig their bones up still; for the country people would go and dig a hole at a distance from them, and then with long poles, and hooks at the end of them, drag the bodies into these Pits, and then throw the earth in, from as far as they could cast it, to cover them; taking notice how the wind blew, and so coming on that side which the seamen call to wind-ward, that the scent of the bodies might blow from them; and thus great numbers went out of the world, who were never known, or any account of them taken; as well within the Bills of Mortality, as without.

buried in the fields, of which no account was kept. Then, of the Anabaptists and other sectaries, who abounded in the city, very few left their habitations; and multitudes of them died, whereof no Churchwarden or other officer had notice; but they found burials according to their own fancies, in small gardens, or the next fields." He further states,—but with evident exaggeration, since the Bills to which he refers return the total number of the deaths in the Plague year, at less than 100,000,—that although "by the Weekly Bills, there appear to have died above one hundred and three-score thousand persons; yet many, who could compute very well, concluded that there were in truth double that number who died; and that, in one week, when the Bill mentioned only six thousand, there had, in truth, fourteen thousand died."—Vide "Life" &c. Continuation, p. 326.

This, indeed, I had, in the main, only from the relation of others, for I seldom walked into the fields, except towards Bethnal-green and Hackney, or as hereafter :— but when I did walk, I always saw a great many poor wanderers at a distance ; but I could know little of their cases ; for whether it were in the street, or in the fields, if we had seen anybody coming, it was a general method to walk away ; yet I believe the account is exactly true.

As this puts me upon mentioning my walking the streets and fields, I cannot omit taking notice what a desolate place the city was at that time. The great street I live in, which is known to be one of the broadest of all the streets of London, I mean of the suburbs, as well as the liberties ; all the side where the butchers lived, especially without the bars, was more like a green field than a paved street, and the people generally went in the middle with the horses and carts. It is true, that the farthest end, towards White-chapel church, was not all paved, but even the part that was paved was full of grass also ; but this need not seem strange, since the great streets within the city, such as Leadenhall-street, Bishopsgate-street, Cornhill, and even the Exchange itself, had grass growing in them in several places. Neither cart nor coach was seen in the streets from morning to evening, except some country carts, to bring roots and beans, or peas, hay, and straw, to the market, and those but very few, compared to what was usual. As for coaches, they were scarce used, but to carry sick people to the pest-houses, and to other hospitals, and some few to carry physicians to such places as they thought fit to venture to visit ; for really coaches were dangerous things, and people did not care to venture into them, because they did not know who might have been carried in them last ; and sick infected people were, as I have said, ordinarily carried in them to the pest-houses, and sometimes people expired in them as they went along.*

It is true, when the infection came to such a height as I have now mentioned, there were very few physicians that cared to stir abroad to sick houses, and very many of the most eminent of the faculty were dead, as well as the surgeons also: for now it was indeed a dismal time, and for about a month together, not taking any notice of the bills of mortality, I believe there did not die less than 1500 or 1700 a day, one day with another.

One of the worst days we had in the whole time, as I thought, was in the beginning of September, when, indeed, good people began to think that God was resolved to make a full end of the people in this miserable city. This was at that time when the Plague was fully come into the eastern parishes. The parish of Aldgate, if I may give my opinion, buried above a thousand a-week, for two weeks, though the bills did not say so many; but it surrounded me at so dismal a rate, that there was not a house in twenty uninfected. In the Minories, in Houndsditch, and in those parts of Aldgate parish about the Butcher-row, and the alleys over against me, I say, in those places, death reigned in every corner. White-chapel parish was in the same condition, and though much less than the parish I lived in, yet buried near 600 a week by the bills; and in my opinion, near twice as many. Whole families, and indeed whole streets of families, were swept away together; insomuch, that it was frequent for neighbours to call to the bellman to go to such and such houses, and fetch out the people, for that they were all dead.

* Pepys, under the date June 23rd, thus notices the danger:—"Home by hackney coach, which is become a very dangerous passage now-a-days, the sickness increasing mightily."

And, indeed, the work of removing the dead bodies by carts was now grown so very odious and dangerous, that it was complained of, that the bearers did not take care to clear such houses where all the inhabitants were dead; but that sometimes the bodies lay several days unburied, till the neighbouring families were offended with the stench, and consequently infected; and this neglect of the officers was such, that the churchwardens and constables were summoned to look after it; and even the justices of the hamlets were obliged to venture their lives among them, to quicken and encourage them, for innumerable of the bearers died of the distemper, infected by the bodies they were obliged to come so near: and had it not been that the number of poor people who wanted employment, and wanted bread (as I have said before), was so great, that necessity drove them to undertake anything, and venture anything, they would never have found people to be employed; and then the bodies of the dead would have lain above ground, and have perished and rotted in a dreadful manner.

But the Magistrates cannot be enough commended in this, that they kept such good order, for the burying of the dead, that as fast as any of those they employed to carry off and bury the dead fell sick or died, as was many times the case, they immediately supplied the places with others, which by reason of the great number of poor that was left out of business, as above, was not hard to do. This occasioned, that notwithstanding the infinite number of people who died, and were sick, almost all together, yet they were always cleared away and carried off every night: so that it was never to be said of London that "the living were not able to bury the dead."

times, so the amazement of the people increased; and a thousand unaccountable things they would do in the violence of their fright, as others did the same in the agonies of their distemper. And this part was very affecting; some went roaring and crying, and wringing their hands along the street; some would go praying and lifting up their hands to heaven, calling upon God for mercy. I cannot say, indeed, whether this was not in their distraction; but be it so, it was still an indication of a more serious mind, when they had the use of their senses, and was much better, even as it was, than the frightful yellings and cryings that every day, and especially in the evenings, were heard in some streets. I suppose the world has heard of the famous Solomon Eagle, an enthusiast; he, though not infected at all, but in his head, went about denouncing of judgment upon the city in a frightful manner; sometimes quite naked, and with a pan of burning charcoal on his head. What he said, or pretended, indeed, I could not learn.

I will not say whether that clergyman was distracted or not, or whether he did it in pure zeal for the poor people, who went every evening through the streets of White-chapel, and with his hands lifted up, repeated that part of the liturgy of the church continually, "Spare us, good Lord, spare thy people whom thou hast redeemed with thy most precious blood;" I say, I cannot speak positively of these things, because these were only the dismal objects which represented themselves to me as I looked through my chamber windows (for I seldom opened the casements), while I confined myself within doors during that most violent raging of the pestilence; when, indeed, as I have said, many began to think, and even to say, that there would none escape; and indeed I began to think so too; and therefore kept within doors for about a fortnight, and never stirred out; but I could not hold it. Besides, there were some people who, notwithstanding the danger, did not omit publicly to attend the worship of God, even in the most dangerous times; and though it is true that a great many clergymen did shut up their churches, and fled as other people did for the safety of their lives,—yet all did not do so; some ventured to officiate, and to keep up the assemblies of the people by constant prayers; and sometimes sermons or brief exhortations to repentance and reformation, and this as long as any would come to hear them; and dissenters did the like also, and even in the very churches, where the parish ministers were either dead or fled;—nor was there any room for making difference, at such a time as this was.

It was indeed a lamentable thing to hear the miserable lamentations of poor dying creatures, calling out for ministers to comfort them and pray with them, to counsel them and to direct them; calling out to God for pardon and mercy, and confessing aloud their past sins. It would make the stoutest heart bleed to hear how many warnings were then given by dying penitents to others, not to put off and delay their repentance to the day of distress; that such a time of calamity as this, was no time for repentance, was no time to call upon God. I wish I could repeat the very sound of those groans, and of those exclamations that I heard from some poor dying creatures when in the height of their agonies and distress; and that I could make him that reads this, hear, as I imagine I now hear them, for the sound seems still to ring in my ears.

If I could but tell this part in such moving accents as should alarm the very soul of the reader, I should rejoice that I recorded these things, however short and imperfect.

It pleased God that I was still spared, and very hearty and sound in health, but very impatient of being pent up within doors without air, as I had been for fourteen days, or thereabouts; and I could not restrain myself, but I would go to carry a letter for my brother to the Post-house: then it was, indeed, that I observed a profound silence in the streets. When I came to the Post-house, as I went to put in my letter, I saw a man stand in one corner of the yard, and talking to another at a window, and a third had opened a door belonging to the office. In the middle of the yard lay a small leather purse, with two keys hanging at it, and money in it, but nobody would meddle with it. I asked how long it had lain there; the man at the window said it had lain almost an hour, but they had not meddled with it, because they did not know but the person who dropped it might come back to look for it. I had no such need of money, nor was the sum so big, that I had any inclination to meddle with it to get the money at the hazard it might be attended with; so I seemed to go away, when the man who had opened the door said he would take it up; but so, that if the right owner came for it he would be sure to have it. So he went in and fetched a pail of water, and set it down hard by the purse, then went again and fetched some gunpowder, and cast a good deal of powder upon the purse, and then made a train from that which he had thrown loose upon the purse; the train reached about two yards. After this he goes in a third time, and fetches out a pair of tongs red hot, and which he had prepared, I suppose, on purpose; and first setting fire to the train of powder, that singed the purse, and also smoked the air sufficiently: but he was not content with that; but he then takes up the purse with the tongs, holding it so long till the tongs burnt through the purse, and then he shook the money out into the pail of water, so he carried it in. The money, as I remember, was about thirteen shillings, and some smooth groats, and brass farthings.*

There might, perhaps, have been several poor people, as I have observed above, that would have been hardy enough to have ventured for the sake of the money; but you may easily see, by what I have observed, that the few people who were spared were very careful of themselves at that time when the distress was so exceeding great.

Much about the same time, I walked out into the fields towards Bow; for I had a great mind to see how things were managed in the river, and among the ships; and as I had some concern in shipping, I had a notion that it had been one of the best ways of securing one's self from the infection, to have retired into a ship; and musing how to satisfy my curiosity in that point, I turned away over the fields from Bow to Bromley, and down to Blackwall, to the stairs, which are there for landing or taking water.

Here I saw a poor man walking on the bank, or seawall, as they call it, by himself. I walked a while also about, seeing the houses all shut up; at last I fell into some talk, at a distance, with this poor man; first, I asked him how the people did thereabouts? “Alas! Sir,” says he, “almost desolate; all dead or sick. Here are very few families in this part, or in that village,” pointing at Poplar, “where half of them are not dead already, and the rest sick.” Then he pointed to one house,—“There they are all dead,” said he, “and the house stands open; nobody dares go into it. A poor thief ventured in to steal something, but he paid dear for his theft, for he was carried to the church-yard too, last night.” Then he pointed to several other houses.—“There,” says he, “they are all dead, the man and his wife and five children; and there they are shut up; you see a watchman at the door:” and so of other houses. “Why,” says I, “what do you here all alone?” “Why,” he replied, “I am a poor desolate man; it has pleased God I am not yet visited, though my family is, and one of my children dead.” “How do you mean then,” said I, “that you are not visited?” “Why,” says he, “that is my house,” pointing to a very little low boarded house, “and there my poor wife and two children live,” continued he, “if they may be said to live; for my wife and one of the children are visited, but I do not come at them.” And with that word I saw the tears run very plentifully down his face; and so they did down mine too I assure you.

* The following singular Advertisement appeared in the "Intelligencer," No. 51.—"This is to notify that the Master of the Cock and Bottle, commonly called the Cock Alehouse, at Temple Bar, hath dismissed his Servants and shut up his house, for this Long Vacation, intending (God willing) to return at Michaelmas next, so that all persons whatsoever who have any accompts with the said Master, or Farthings belonging to the said house, are desired to repair thither before the 8th of this instant July, and they shall receive satisfaction."—The Cock is still a well-known and much frequented House, on the north side of Fleet Street, between Bell Yard and Chancery Lane

“But,” said I, “why do you not come at them? how can you abandon your own flesh and blood?” “Oh! Sir,” says he, “the Lord forbid; I do not abandon them; I work for them as much as I am able; and blessed be the Lord, I keep them from want;” and with that I observed he lifted up his eyes to heaven, with a countenance, that presently told me I had happened on a man who was no hypocrite, but a serious religious good man; and his ejaculation was an expression of thankfulness that in such a condition as he was in, he should be able to say his family did not want. "Well," says I, "honest man, that is a great mercy as things go now with the poor: but how do you live then, and how are you kept from the dreadful calamity that is now upon us all?" "Why, Sir," says he, "I am a waterman, and there is my boat; and the boat serves me for a house; I work in it in the day, and I sleep in it in the night;—and what I get, I lay down upon that stone," says he, shewing me a broad stone on the other side of the street, a good way from his house, "and then I halloo, and call to them till I make them hear; and they come and fetch it.

"Well, friend," says I, "but how can you get any money as a waterman? does any body go by water these times?" "Yes, Sir," says he, "in the way I am employed there does. Do you see there, where five ships lie at anchor," pointing down the river, a good way below the town: "and do you see," says he, "eight or ten ships lie at the chain there, and at anchor yonder?" pointing above the town. "All those ships have families on board, of their merchants and owners and such like, who have locked themselves up, and live on board, close shut in, for fear of the infection; and I tend on them to fetch things for them, carry letters, and do what is absolutely necessary, that they may not be obliged to come on shore; and every night I fasten my boat on board one of the ship's boats, and there I sleep, by myself, and, blessed be God, I am preserved hitherto."

"Well," said I, "friend, but will they let you come on board, after you have been on shore here, when this is such a terrible place, and so infected as it is?"

"Why, as to that," said he, "I very seldom go up the ship's side, but deliver what I bring to their boat, or lie

by the side, and they hoist it on board : if I did, I think they are in no danger from me, for I never go into any house on shore, or touch any body, no, not of my own family ; but I fetch provisions for them."

"Nay," says I, "but that may be worse, for you must have those provisions of somebody or other ; and since all this part of the town is so infected, it is dangerous so much as to speak with any body ; for the village," said I, "is, as it were, the beginning of London, though it be at some distance from it."

"That is true," added he, "but you do not understand me right ; I do not buy provisions for them here : I row up to Greenwich and buy fresh meat there, and sometimes I row down the river to Woolwich and buy there ; then I go to single farm-houses on the Kentish side, where I am known, and buy fowls, and eggs, and butter, and bring them to the ships, as they direct me, sometimes one, sometimes the other : I seldom come on shore here ; and I came now only to call to my wife, and hear how my little family do, and give them a little money, which I received last night."

"Poor man !" said I, "and how much hast thou gotten for them ?"

"I have gotten four shillings," said he, "which is a great sum, as things go now with poor men ; but they have given me a bag of bread too, and a salt fish and some flesh ; so all helps out."

"Well," said I, "and have you given it them yet ?"

"No," said he, "but I have called, and my wife has answered, that she cannot come out yet, but in half an hour she hopes to come, and I am waiting for her. Poor woman !" says he, "she is brought sadly down ; she has a swelling, and it is broke, and I hope she will recover; but I fear the child will die: but it is the Lord!"—Here he stopt, and wept very much.

"Well, honest friend," said I, "thou hast a sure Comforter, if thou hast brought thyself to be resigned to the will of God; he is dealing with us all in judgment."

"Oh, Sir," says he, "it is infinite mercy, if any of us are spared; and who am I, to repine?"

"Sayest thou so," said I, "and how much less is my faith than thine!"—And here my heart smote me, suggesting how much better this poor man's foundation was, on which he stayed in the danger, than mine; that he had no where to flee to; that he had a family to bind him to attendance, which I had not; and mine was mere presumption, his a true dependence, and a courage resting on God; and yet, that he used all possible caution for his safety.

I turned a little way from the man, while these thoughts engaged me, for, indeed, I could no more refrain from tears than he.

At length, after some further talk, the poor woman opened the door, and called, Robert, Robert; he answered, and bid her stay a few moments, and he would come; so he ran down the common stairs to his boat, and fetched up a sack in which were the provisions he had brought from the ships; and when he returned, he hallooed again; then he went to the great stone which he showed me, and emptied the sack, and laid all out, everything by themselves, and then retired; and his wife came with a little boy to fetch them away; and he called, and said, such a captain had sent such a thing, and such a captain such a thing; and at the end adds, "God has sent it all: give thanks to him." When the poor woman had taken up all, she was so weak she could not carry it at once in, though the weight was not much neither; so she left the biscuit, which was in a little bag, and left her little boy to watch it till she came again.

“Well, but,” says I to him, “did you leave her the four shillings too, which you said was your week’s pay?”

“Yes, yes,” says he, “you shall hear her own it.” So he calls again, “Rachel, Rachel (which was, it seems, her name), did you take up the money?” “Yes,” said she. “How much was it?” said he. “Four shillings and a groat,” said she. “Well, well,” says he, “the Lord keep you all;” and so he turned to go away.

As I could not refrain from contributing tears to this man’s story, so neither could I refrain from my charity for his assistance; so I called him,—“Hark thee, friend, come hither; for I believe thou art in health, that I may venture thee;” so I pulled out my hand, which was in my pocket before;—“Here,” says I, “go and call thy Rachel once more, and give her a little more comfort from me. God will never forsake a family that trust in him as thou dost.” So I gave him four other shillings, and bade him go lay them on the stone, and call his wife.

I have not words to express the poor man’s thankfulness, neither could he express it himself, but by tears running down his face. He called his wife, and told her God had moved the heart of a stranger, upon hearing their condition, to give them all that money; and a great deal more such as that he said to her. The woman too made signs of the like thankfulness, as well to Heaven as to me, and joyfully pick’d it up: and I parted with no money all that year that I thought better bestowed.

I then asked the poor man if the distemper had not reached Greenwich: He said it had not, till about a fortnight before; but that then he feared it had; but that it was only at that end of the town which lay south towards Deptford bridge; that he went only to a butcher's shop and a grocer's, where he generally bought such things as they sent him for: but was very careful.*

I asked him then, how it came to pass that those people who had so shut themselves up in the ships had not laid in sufficient stores of all things necessary? He said some of them had, but on the other hand, some did not come on board till they were frightened into it, and till it was too dangerous for them to go to the proper people to lay in quantities of things; and that he waited on two ships (which he showed me) that had laid in little or nothing but biscuit bread and ship beer; and that he had bought everything else almost for them. I asked him if there were any more ships that had separated themselves as those had done? He told me, "Yes, all the way up from the point, right against Greenwich, to within the shores of Limehouse and Redriff, all the ships that could have room rid two and two in the middle of the stream, * Evelyn, in some letters to Lord Viscount Cornbery, dated from his own residence at Say's Court, Deptford, on the 9th and 12th of September, 1665, thus notices the devastation of that time.—"After 6978 (and possibly half as many more concealed) which the Pestilence has mowed down in London this week, near thirty houses are visited in this miserable village, whereof one has been the very nearest to my dwelling.—It was Saturday last ere my courageous wife could be persuaded to take the alarm, but she is now fled, with most of my family.—If the malignity of this sad contagion spend no faster before winter, the calamity will be indescribable.—My very heart turns within me at the contemplation of our calamity.—God give the repentance of David to the Times of David! We have all added some weights to this burden; Ingratitude and Luxurie, and the too, too soon oblivion of Miracles."—Evelyn's "Memoirs," &c., vol. ii. pp. 157-160.—The number of persons recorded to have died of the Plague at Deptford, in 1665, is 374; but in the following year, it was still more fatal there, 522 persons becoming its victims.

Evelyn writes thus, under the date April 15th, 1666:—"Our parish was now more infected with the Plague than ever, and so was all the country above, tho' (it had) almost quite ceased in London." See "Memoirs," &c., vol. i. p. 386.

and that some of them had several families on board." I asked him if the distemper had not reached them? He said, "he believed it had not, except two or three ships, whose people had not been so watchful to keep the seamen from going on shore, as others had been;" and he said, "it was a very fine sight to see how the ships lay up the pool."

When he said he was going over to Greenwich, as soon as the tide began to come in, I asked him if he would let me go with him, and bring me back; for that I had a great mind to see how the ships were ranged, as he had told me. He told me, if I would assure him, on the word of a Christian and of an honest man, that I had not the distemper, he would. I assured him that I had not, that it had pleased God to preserve me, that I lived in White-chapel, but was too impatient of being so long within doors, and that I had ventured out so far for the refreshment of a little air; but that none in my house had so much as been touched with it.

"Well, Sir," says he, "as your charity has been moved to pity me and my poor family, sure you cannot have so little pity left, as to put yourself into my boat if you were not sound in health, which would be nothing less than killing me, and ruining my whole family." The poor man troubled me so much, when he spoke of his family with such a sensible concern, and in such an affectionate manner, that I could not satisfy myself, at first, to go at all. I told him I would lay aside my curiosity rather than make him uneasy; though I was sure, and very thankful for it, that I had no more distemper upon me, than the freshest man in the world. Well, he would not have me put it off neither, but to let me see how confident he was that I was just to him, he now importuned me to go: so when the tide came up to his boat, I went in, and he carried me to Greenwich. While he bought the things which he had in his charge to buy, I walked up to the top of the hill, under which the town stands, and on the east side of the town, to get a prospect of the river: but it was a surprising sight to see the number of ships which lay in rows, two and two, and in some places, two or three such lines in the breadth of the river, and this not only up quite to the town, between the houses which we call Ratcliff and Redriff, which they name the pool, but even down the whole river, as far as the head of Long Reach, which is as far as the hills give us leave to see it.

I cannot guess at the number of ships, but I think there must be several hundred sail; and I could not but applaud the contrivance; for ten thousand people and more, who attended ship affairs, were certainly sheltered here from the violence of the contagion, and lived very safe and very easy.

I returned to my own dwelling very well satisfied with my day's journey, and particularly with the poor man; also I rejoiced to see that such little sanctuaries were provided for so many families on board, in a time of such desolation. I observed also, that as the violence of the plague had increased, so the ships which had families on board, removed and went farther off, till, as I was told, some went quite away to sea, and put into such harbours and safe roads on the north coast, as they could best come at.

But it was also true that all the people who thus left the land, and lived on board the ships, were not entirely safe from the infection, for many died, and were thrown over-board, into the river, some in coffins; and some, as I heard, without coffins, whose bodies were seen sometimes to drive up and down with the tide in the river.

But, I believe, I may venture to say, that in those ships which were thus infected, it either happened where the people had recourse to them too late, and did not fly to the ship till they had stayed too long on shore, and had the distemper upon them, though, perhaps, they might not perceive it; and so the distemper did not come to them on board the ships, but they really carried it with them: or, it was in those ships where the poor watermen said they had not had time to furnish themselves with provisions, but were obliged to send often on shore to buy what they had occasion for, or suffered boats to come to them from the shore: and so the distemper was brought insensibly among them.

And here I cannot but take notice that the strange temper of the people of London at that time contributed extremely to their own destruction. The Plague began, as I have observed, at the other end of the town, namely, in Long-acre, Drury-lane, &c., and came on towards the city very gradually and slowly. It was felt at first in December, then again in February, then again in April, and always but a very little at a time; then it stopt till May, and even the last week in May there were but 17, and all at that end of the town [except two]; and all this while, even so long as till there died about 3000 a week, had the people in Redriff, and in Wapping, and Ratcliff, on both sides the river, and almost all Southwark-side, a mighty fancy that they should not be visited, or at least, that it would not be so violent among them. Some people fancied the smell of the pitch and tar, and such other things, as oil, and resin, and brimstone, which is so much used by all trades relating to shipping, would preserve them. Others argued it, because it was in its extremest violence in Westminster and the parishes of St. Giles and St. Andrew, &c., and began to abate again, before it came among them, which was true indeed, in part: for example:—

N.B.—That it was observed the numbers mentioned in Stepney parish, at that time, were generally all on that side where Stepney parish joined to Shoreditch, which we now call Spittle-fields, where the parish of Stepney comes up to the very wall of Shoreditch church-yard; and the Plague at this time was abated at St. Giles's in the Fields, and raged most violently in Cripplegate, Bishopsgate, and Shoreditch parishes, but there were not ten people a week that died of it in all that part of Stepney parish which takes in Limehouse and Ratcliff-highway, and which are now the parishes of Shadwell and Wapping, even to St. Katherine's by the Tower, till after the whole month of August was expired; but they paid for it afterwards, as I shall observe by-and-by.

This, I say, made the people of Redriff and Wapping, Ratcliff and Limehouse, so secure, and flatter themselves so much with the Plague's going off without reaching them, that they took no care either to flee into the country, or shut themselves up; nay, so far were they from stirring, that they rather received their friends and relations from the city into their houses; and several from other places really took sanctuary in that part of the town as a place of safety, and as a place which they thought God would pass over, and not visit as the rest was visited.

And this was the reason, that when it came upon them they were more surprised, more unprovided, and more at a loss what to do, than they were in other places, for, when it came among them really, and with violence, as it did in September and October, there was then no stirring out into the country, nobody would suffer a stranger to come near them, no, nor near the towns where they dwelled; and, as I have been told, several that wandered into the country, on Surrey side, were found starved to death in the woods and commons, that country being more open and more woody than any other part so near London; especially about Norwood and the parishes of Camberwell, Dullege [Dulwich], and Lusum [Lewisham], where, it seems, nobody durst relieve the poor distressed people for fear of the infection.

This notion having, as I said, prevailed with the people in that part of the town, was in part the occasion, as I said before, that they had recourse to ships for their retreat; and where they did this early, and with prudence, furnishing themselves so with provisions, that they had no need to go on shore for supplies, nor suffer boats to come on board to bring them; I say, where they did so, they had certainly the safest retreat of any people whatsoever. But the distress was such that people ran on board in their fright, without bread to eat; and some into ships that had no men on board to remove them farther off, or to take the boat and go down the river to buy provisions, where it might be done safely; and these often suffered, and were infected on board as much as on shore.

As the richer sort got into ships, so the lower rank got into hoys, smacks, lighters and fishing-boats, and many, especially watermen, lay in their boats; but those made sad work of it, especially the latter, for, going about for provision, and perhaps to get their subsistence, the infection got in among them, and made a fearful havock. Many of the watermen died alone in their wherries, as they rid at their roads, as well above bridge as below, and were not found, sometimes, till they were not in condition for anybody to touch or come near them.

Indeed the distress of the people at this sea-faring end of the town was very deplorable, and deserved the greatest commiseration. But alas! this was a time when every one's private safety lay so near them, that they had no room to pity the distresses of others; for every one had death, as it were, at his door, and many even in their families, and knew not what to do, nor whither to flee.

This I say took away all compassion. Self-preservation, indeed, appeared here to be the first law, for the children ran away from their parents, as they languished in the utmost distress; and in some places, though not so frequent as the other, parents did the like to their children: nay, some dreadful examples there were, and particularly two in one week, of distressed mothers, raving and distracted, killing their own children; one whereof was not far off from where I dwelt; the poor lunatic creature not living herself long enough to be sensible of the sin of what she had done, much less to be punished for it.

It is not, indeed, to be wondered at; for the danger of immediate death to ourselves took away all bowels of love, all concern for one another. I speak in general, for there were many instances of immovable affection, pity, and duty, in many; and some that came to my knowledge; that is to say, by hear-say: for I shall not take upon me to vouch the truth of the particulars.

To introduce one, let me first mention, that one of the most deplorable cases in all the present calamity, was that of women with child, who, when they came to the hour of their sorrows, and their pains came upon them, could neither have help of one kind nor another; neither midwife or neighbouring women to come near them. Most of the midwives were dead; especially of such as served the poor; and many, if not all the midwives of note, were fled into the country: so that it was next to impossible for a poor woman that could not pay an immoderate price, to get any midwife to come to her; and if they did, those they could get were generally unskilful and ignorant creatures; and the consequence of this was, that a most unusual and incredible number of women were reduced to the utmost distress. Some were delivered and spoiled by the rashness and ignorance of those who pretended to lay them. Children without number were, I might say, murdered by the same, but a more justifiable ignorance, pretending they would save the mother, whatever became of the child; and many times, both mother and child were lost in the same manner; and especially where the mother had the distemper, there nobody would come near them, and both sometimes perished. Sometimes the mother has died of the Plague, and the infant, it may be, half-born or born, but not parted from the mother. Some died in the very pains of their travail, and not delivered at all; and so many were the cases of this kind that it is hard to judge of them.

Something of it will appear in the unusual numbers which are put into the weekly bills (though I am far from allowing them to be able to give anything of a full account) under the articles of

Abortive and Still-born.

Chrisoms and Infants.

Take the weeks in which the Plague was most violent, and compare them with the weeks before the distemper began, even in the same year : for example—

		Child-bed.	Abort.	Still-born.

	to 26	42	6	10
	Sep. 26 to Oct. 3	14	4	9
		291	61	80

To the disparity of these numbers, it is to be considered and allowed for, that according to our usual opinion, who were then upon the spot, there were not one-third of the people in the town during the months of August and September, as were in the months of January and February. In a word, the usual number that used to die of these three articles, and, as I hear, did die of them the year before, was thus :—

1664	{Child-bed Abort. and Still-born	189 458		1665	{Child-bed Abort. and Still-born	625 617*
		<hr/> 647				<hr/> 1242

This inequality, I say, is exceedingly augmented when the numbers of people are considered. I pretend not to make any exact calculation of the numbers of people which were at this time in the city; but I shall make a probable conjecture at that part by-and-by. What I have said now is to explain the misery of those poor creatures above, so that it might well be said, as in the Scripture—“Woe be to those who are with child, and to those who give suck in that day.” For, indeed, it was a woe to them in particular.

I was not conversant in many particular families where these things happened; but the outcries of the miserable were heard afar off. As to those who were with child, we have seen some calculation made; two hundred and ninety-one women dead in child-bed in nine weeks, out of one-third part of the number, of whom there usually died in that time but forty-eight of the same disaster.

* The increase of Mortality under the head “Abortive and Still-born” in the year of the Plague, was by no means so great, comparatively, as in that of the deaths in “Child-bed,” as will be seen by the following extracts from the Bills of Mortality, which include the returns for ten years, viz., from 1661 to 1670.—The numbers given by De Foe, under the year 1664, are not correct. The actual amount exceeded the total which he has given by 106.

Abortive and Still-Born.	Child-bed.
1661	511	224
1662	523	175
1663	550	206
1664	503	250
1665	617	625
1666	477	253
1667	488	262
1668	751	271

There is no room to doubt but the misery of those that gave suck was in proportion as great. Our bills of mortality could give but little light in this; yet some it did. There were several more than usual starved at nurse; but this was nothing. The misery was, where they were, 1st, starved for want of a nurse, the mothers dying and all the family, and the infants found dead by them, merely for want; and, if I may speak my opinion, I do believe that many hundreds of poor helpless infants perished in this manner: 2ndly, not starved, but poisoned by the nurse. Nay, even where the mother has been nurse, and having received the infection, has poisoned, that is, infected the infant with her milk, even before she knew she was infected herself; nay, and the infant has died in such a case before the mother. I cannot but remember to leave this admonition upon record, if ever such another dreadful visitation should happen in this city; that all women that are with child, or that give suck, should be gone, if they have any possible means, out of the place; because their misery, if infected, will so much exceed all other people's.*

I could tell here dismal stories of living infants being found sucking the breasts of their mothers, or nurses, after they had been dead of the Plague. Of a mother, in the parish where I lived, who having a child that was not well, sent for an apothecary to view the child; and when he came, as the relation goes, was giving the child suck at her breast, and to all appearance, was herself very well ; but when the apothecary came close to her, he saw the tokens upon that breast with which she was suckling the child. He was surprised enough to be sure ; but not willing to fright the poor woman too much, he desired she would give the child into his hand ; so he takes the child, and going to a cradle in the room, lays it in, and opening its clothes, found the tokens upon the child too, and both died before he could get home to send a preventive medicine to the father of the child, to whom he told their condition : whether the child infected the nurse-mother, or the mother the child, was not certain, but the last most likely.

* Notwithstanding the great mortality alleged to have taken place among females, it appears from the Bills of Mortality, that the difference between the male and female deaths during the year was only 168, namely:—

Deaths	{	Females	.....	48,737
		Males	.....	48,569

Likewise of a child brought home to the parents from a nurse that had died of the Plague ; yet the tender mother would not refuse to take in her child, and laid it in her bosom, by which she was infected, and died, with the child in her arms dead also.

It would make the hardest heart move at the instances that were frequently found of tender mothers tending and watching with their dear children, and even dying before them, and sometimes taking the distemper from them, and dying, when the child, for whom the affectionate heart had been sacrificed, has got over it and escaped.

The like of a tradesman in East Smithfield, whose wife was big with child of her first child, and fell in labour having the Plague upon her. He could neither get midwife to assist her, nor nurse to tend her ; and two servants which he kept fled both from her. He ran from house to house like one distracted, but could get no help ; the utmost he could get was, that a watchman, who attended at an infected house shut up, promised to send a nurse in the morning, The poor man, with his heart broken, went back ; assisted his wife what he could, acted the part of the midwife, and brought the child dead into the world: his wife, in about an hour, died in his arms, where he held her dead body fast till the morning, when the watchman came, and brought the nurse, as he had promised; and coming up the stairs, for he had left the door open, or only latched, they found the man sitting with his dead wife in his arms, and so overwhelmed with grief that he died in a few hours after, without any sign of the infection upon him, but merely sunk under the weight of his grief.

I have heard also of some who, on the death of their relations, have grown stupid with the insupportable sorrow; and of one in particular, who was so absolutely overcome with the pressure upon his spirits, that by degrees his head sunk into his body, so between his shoulders, that the crown of his head was very little seen above the bones of his shoulders; and by degrees, losing both voice and sense, his face looking forward, lay against his collar-bone, and could not be kept up any otherwise, unless held up by the hands of other people; and the poor man never came to himself again, but languished near a year in that condition, and died. Nor was he ever once seen to lift up his eyes, or to look upon any particular object.*

I cannot undertake to give any other than a summary of such passages as these, because it was not possible to come at the particulars, where sometimes the whole families where such things happened, were carried off by the distemper; but there were innumerable cases of this kind, presented to the eye, and the ear, even in passing along the streets, as I have hinted above:—nor is it easy to give any story of this or that family, to which there were not divers parallel stories to be met with of the same kind.

But as I am now talking of the time when the Plague raged at the easternmost part of the town; how for a long time the people of those parts had flattered themselves that they should escape; and how they were surprised when it came upon them as it did; for indeed, it came upon them like an armed man when it did come: I say, this brings me back to the three poor men, who wandered from Wapping, not knowing whither to go, or what to do, and whom I mentioned before; one a biscuit-baker, one a sail-maker, and the other a joiner; all of Wapping, or thereabouts.

The sleepiness and security of that part, as I have observed, was such, that they not only did not shift for themselves, as others did, but they boasted of being safe, and of safety being with them; and many people fled out of the city, and out of the infected suburbs, to Wapping, Ratcliff, Limehouse, Poplar, and such places, as to places of security; and it is not at all unlikely, that their doing this, helped to bring the-Plague that way faster than it might otherwise have come. For, though I am much for people's fleeing away, and emptying such a town as this, upon the first appearance of a like visitation, and that all people, who have any possible retreat, should make use of it in time, and be gone; yet I must say, when all that will flee are gone, those that are left and must stand it, should stand stock still where they are, and not shift from one end of the town, or one part of the town, to the other, for that is the bane and mischief of the whole, and they carry the Plague from house to house in their very clothes.

Wherefore were we ordered to kill all the dogs and cats? but because, as they were domestic animals, and are apt to run from house to house, and from street to street, so they are capable of carrying the effluvia, or infectious steams, of bodies infected, even in their furs and hair: and therefore it was, that in the beginning of the infection, an order was published by the Lord Mayor, and by the Magistrates, according to the advice of the physicians, that all the dogs and cats should be immediately killed, and an officer was appointed for the execution.

It is incredible, if their account is to be depended upon, what a prodigious number of those creatures were destroyed: I think they talked of forty thousand dogs, and five times as many cats! few houses being without a cat, some having several, sometimes five or six in a house. All possible endeavours were used also to destroy the mice and rats, especially the latter, by laying ratsbane, and other poisons for them, and a prodigious multitude of them was also destroyed.

I often reflected upon the unprovided condition that the whole body of the people were in, at the first coming of this calamity upon them, and how it was for want of timely entering into measures and managements, as well public as private, that all the confusions that followed were brought upon us, and that such a prodigious number of people sunk in that disaster, which, if proper steps had been taken, might, Providence concurring, have been avoided; and which, if posterity think fit, they may take a caution and warning from:—but I shall come to this part again.

I come back again to my three men. Their story has a moral in every part of it, and their whole conduct, and that of some whom they joined with, is a pattern for all poor men to follow, or women either, if ever such a time comes again ; and if there was no other end in recording it, I think this a very just one, whether my account be exactly according to fact or no.

Two of them are said to be brothers, the one an old soldier, but now a biscuit-baker ; the other a lame sailor, out now a sail-maker ; the third, a joiner. Says John, the biscuit-baker, one day, to Thomas, his brother, the sail-maker,—“ Brother Tom, what will become of us ? The Plague grows hot in the city, and increases this way : what shall we do ? ”

“ Truly,” says Thomas, “ I am at a great loss what to do ; for I find, if it comes down into Wapping, I shall be turned out of my lodging.”—And thus they began to talk of it beforehand :—

JOHN.—“ Turned out of your lodging, Tom ! if you are, I don’t know who will take you in ; for people are so afraid of one another now, there’s no getting a lodging anywhere.”

THOMAS.—“ Why, the people where I lodge are good civil people, and have kindness enough for me too ; but they say I go abroad every day to my work, and it will be dangerous ; and they talk of locking themselves up, and letting nobody come near them.”

JOHN.—“ Why, they are in the right, to be sure, if they resolve to venture staying in town.”

THOMAS.—“ Nay, I might e’en resolve to stay within doors too ; for, except a suit of sails that my master has in hand, and which I am just finishing, I am like to get no more work a great while : there’s no trade stirs now : workmen and servants are turned off everywhere, so that I might be glad to be locked up too ; but I do not see they will be willing to consent to that any more than to the other.”

JOHN.—“Why, what will you do then, brother? and what shall I do? for I am almost as bad as you. The people where I lodge are all gone into the country, but a maid, and she is to go next week, and to shut the house quite up; so that I shall be turned adrift to the wide world before you are, and I am resolved to go away too, if I knew but where to go.”

THOMAS.—“We were both distracted we did not go away at first, then we might have travelled anywhere: there’s no stirring now; we shall be starved if we pretend to go out of town: they won’t let us have victuals, no, not for our money, nor let us come into the towns, much less into their houses.”

JOHN.—“And that which is almost as bad, I have but little money to help myself with neither.”

THOMAS.—“As to that we might make shift. I have a little, though not much; but I tell you, there’s no stirring on the road. I know a couple of poor honest men in our street have attempted to travel; and at Barnet or Whetstone, or thereabout, the people offered to fire at them, if they pretended to go forward; so they are come back again quite discouraged.”

JOHN.—“I would have ventured their fire if I had been there: if I had been denied food for my money, they should have seen me take it before their faces; and if I had tendered money for it, they could not have taken any course with me by law.”

THOMAS.—“You talk your old soldier’s language, as if you were in the Low Countries now, but this is a serious thing. The people have good reason to keep anybody off that they are not satisfied are sound, at such a time as this, and we must not plunder them.”

JOHN.—“No, brother, you mistake the case, and mistake me too—I would plunder nobody; but, for any town upon the road to deny me leave to pass through the town in the open highway, and deny me provisions for my money, is to say the town has a right to starve me to death, which cannot be true.”

THOMAS.—“But they do not deny you liberty to go back again from whence you came, and therefore they do not starve you.”

JOHN.—“But the next town behind me will, by the same rule, deny me leave to go back, and so they do starve me between them; besides, there is no law to prohibit my travelling wherever I will on the road.”

THOMAS.—“But there will be so much difficulty in disputing with them at every town on the road, that it is not for poor men to do it, or to undertake it, at such a time as this is especially.”

JOHN.—“Why, brother, our condition, at this rate, is worse than anybody’s else; for we can neither go away nor stay here. I am of the same mind with the lepers of Samaria:—‘If we stay here we are sure to die.’ I mean especially, as you and I are situated, without a dwelling-house of our own, and without lodging in anybody’s else: there is no lying in the street at such a time as this; we had as good go into the dead-cart at once. Therefore, I say, if we stay here we are sure to die, and if we go away we can but die;—I am resolved to be gone.”

THOMAS.—“You will go away. Whither will you go? and what can you do? I would as willingly go away as you, if I knew whither: but we have no acquaintance, no friends. Here we were born, and here we must die.”

JOHN.—“Look you, Tom, the whole kingdom is my native country as well as this town. You may as well say, I must not go out of my house if it be on fire, as that I must not go out of the town I was born in, when it is infected with the Plague. I was born in England, and have a right to live in it if I can."

THOMAS.—"But you know every vagrant person may, by the laws of England, be taken up, and passed back to their last legal settlement."

JOHN.—"But how shall they make me vagrant? I desire only to travel on upon my lawful occasions."

THOMAS.—"What lawful occasions can we pretend to travel, or rather wander upon? They will not be put off with words."

JOHN.—"Is not flying to save our lives a lawful occasion? and do they not all know that the fact is true? We cannot be said to dissemble."

THOMAS.—"But suppose they let us pass, whither shall we go?"

JOHN.—"Anywhere to save our lives; it is time enough to consider that when we are got out of this town. If I am once out of this dreadful place, I care not where I go."

THOMAS.—"We shall be driven to great extremities. I know not what to think of it."

JOHN.—"Well, Tom, consider of it a little."

This was about the beginning of July; and though the Plague was come forward in the west and north parts of the town, yet all Wapping, as I have observed before, and Redriff, and Ratcliff, and Limehouse, and Poplar—in short, Deptford and Greenwich, all both sides of the river from the Hermitage, and from over against it, quite down to Blackwall, was entirely free, there had not one person died of the Plague in all Stepney parish, and not one on the south side of Whitechapel-road, no, not in any parish; and yet the weekly bill was that very week risen up to 1006.*

It was a fortnight after this before the two brothers met again, and then the case was a little altered, and the Plague was exceedingly advanced, and the number greatly increased; the Bill was up at 2785, and prodigiously increasing, though still both sides of the river, as before, kept pretty well. But some began to die in Redriff, and about five or six in Ratcliff-highway, when the sail-maker came to his brother John express, and in some fright, for he was absolutely warned out of his lodging, and had only a week to provide himself. His brother John was in as bad a case, for he was quite out, and had only begged leave of his master, the biscuit-baker, to lodge in an out-house belonging to his work-house, where he lay upon straw only, with some biscuit sacks, or bread sacks as they called them, laid upon it, and some of the same sacks to cover him.

Here they resolved, seeing all employment was at an end, and no work or wages to be had, they would make the best of their way to get out of the reach of the dreadful infection; and being as good husbands as they could, would endeavour to live upon what they had as long as it would last, and then work for more, if they could get work anywhere, of any kind, let it be what it would.

While they were considering to put this resolution in practice, in the best manner they could, the third man, who was acquainted very well with the sail-maker, came to know of the design, and got leave to be one of the number; and thus they prepared to set out.

* The weekly bill of the 4th of July, which records the above number of deaths, states also that two persons had died of the Plague in Stepney parish; and six others in St. Mary's, Whitechapel.

It happened that they had not an equal share of money ; but as the sail-maker, who had the best stock, was, besides his being lame, the most unfit to expect to get anything by working in the country, so he was content that what money they had should all go into one public stock, on condition, that whatever any one of them could gain more than another, it should, without any grudging, be all added to the same public stock.

They resolved to load themselves with as little baggage as possible, because they resolved at first to travel on foot, and to go a great way, that they might, if possible, be effectually safe ; and a great many consultations they had with themselves, before they could agree about what way they should travel, which they were so far from adjusting, that, even to the morning they set out, they were not resolved on it.

At last, the seaman put in a hint that determined it.—“First,” says he, “the weather is very hot, and therefore I am for travelling north, that we may not have the sun upon our faces and beating on our breasts, which will heat and suffocate us ; and I have been told,” says he, “that it is not good to overheat our blood at a time when, for aught we know, the infection may be in the very air. In the next place,” says he, “I am for going the way that may be contrary to the wind as it may blow when we set out, that we may not have the wind blow the air of the city on our backs as we go.” These two cautions were approved of ; if it could be brought so to hit, that the wind might not be in the south when they set out to go north.

John, the baker, who had been a soldier, then put in his opinion.—“First,” says he, “we none of us expect to get any lodging on the road, and it will be a little too hard to lie just in the open air: though it be warm weather, yet it may be wet and damp, and we have a double reason to take care of our healths at such a time as this; and therefore," says he, "you, brother Tom, that are a sail-maker, might easily make us a little tent, and I will undertake to set it up every night, and take it down, and a fig for all the inns in England: if we have a good tent over our heads, we shall do well enough."

The joiner opposed this, and told them, let them leave that to him, he would undertake to build them a house every night with his hatchet and mallet, though he had no other tools, which should be fully to their satisfaction, and as good as a tent.

The soldier and the joiner disputed that point some time, but at last the soldier carried it for a tent; the only objection against it was, that it must be carried with them, and that would increase their baggage too much, the weather being hot; but the sail-maker had a piece of good hap fell in, which made that easy, for his master whom he worked for having a rope-walk, as well as his sail-making trade, had a little poor horse that he made no use of then, and being willing to assist the three honest men, he gave them the horse for the carrying their baggage; also, for a small matter of three days' work that his man did for him before he went, he let him have an old top-gallant sail that was worn out, but was sufficient and more than enough to make a very good tent; the soldier showed how to shape it, and they soon, by his direction, made their tent, and fitted it with poles or staves for the purpose, and thus they were furnished for their journey; viz.: three men, one tent, one horse, one gun, for the soldier would not go without arms, for now he said he was no more a biscuit-baker, but a trooper.

The joiner had a small bag of tools, such as might be useful if he should get any work abroad, as well for their subsistence as his own. What money they had, they brought all into one public stock, and thus they began their journey. It seems, that in the morning when they set out, the wind blew, as the sailor said, by his pocket-compass, at N.W. by W.; so they directed, or rather resolved to direct, their course N.W.

But then a difficulty came in their way, that as they set out from the hither end of Wapping, near the Hermitage, and that the Plague was now very violent, especially on the north side of the city, as in Shoreditch and Cripplegate parish, they did not think it safe for them to go near those parts; so they went away east, through Radcliff-highway, as far as Radcliff-cross, and leaving Stepney church still on their left hand, being afraid to come up from Radcliff-cross to Mile-end, because they must come just by the church-yard, and because the wind, that seemed to blow more from the west, blew directly from the side of the city where the Plague was hottest. So I say, leaving Stepney, they fetched a long compass, and going to Poplar and Bromley, came into the great road just at Bow.

Here the watch placed upon Bow-bridge would have questioned them; but they, crossing the road into a narrow way that turns out of the higher end of the town of Bow to Old-Ford, avoided any inquiry there, and travelled to Old-Ford. The constables everywhere were upon their guard, not so much, it seems, to stop people passing by, as to stop them from taking up their abode in their towns, but withal, because of a report that was newly raised at that time, and that indeed was not very improbable, viz., "that the poor people in London being distressed and starved for want of work and by that means for want of bread, were up in arms, and had raised a tumult, and that they would come out to all the towns round to plunder for bread." This, I say, was only a rumour, and it was very well it was no more; but it was not so far off from being a reality as it has been thought, for in a few weeks more the poor people became so desperate by the calamity they suffered, that they were with great difficulty kept from running out into the fields and towns, and tearing all in pieces wherever they came; and, as I have observed before, nothing hindered them but that the Plague raged so violently, and fell in upon them so furiously, that they rather went to the grave by thousands, than into the fields in mobs by thousands. For in the parts above the parishes of St. Sepulchre, Clerkenwell, Cripplegate, Bishopsgate, and Shoreditch, which were the places where the mob began to threaten, the distemper came on so furiously, that there died in those few parishes, even then, before the Plague was come to its height, no less than 5361 people in the first three weeks in August, when, at the same time, the parts about Wapping, Radcliff, and Rotherhithe, were, as before described, hardly touched, or but very lightly; so that, in a word, though, as I said before, the good management of the Lord Mayor and Justices did much to prevent the rage and desperation of the people from breaking out in rabbles and tumults, and, in short, the poor from plundering the rich; I say, though they did much, the dead-cart did more: for, as I have said, that in five parishes only, there died above 5,000 in twenty days, so there might be probably three times that number sick all that time; for some recovered, and great numbers fell sick every day, and died afterwards. Besides, I must still be allowed to say, that if the bills of mortality said five thousand, I always believed it was near twice as many in reality ; there being no room to believe that the account they gave was right, or that, indeed, they were, among such confusions as I saw them in, in any condition to keep an exact account.

But to return to my travellers:—Here they were only examined ; and as they seemed rather coming from the country than from the city, they found the people the easier with them ; that they talked to them, let them come into a public-house where the constable and his warders were, and gave them drink and some victuals, which greatly refreshed and encouraged them ; and here it came into their heads to say, when they should be inquired of afterwards, not that they came from London, but that they came out of Essex.

To forward this little fraud, they obtained so much favour of the constable at Old-Ford, as to give them a certificate of their passing from Essex through that village, and that they had not been at London, which, though false in the common acceptation of London in that county, yet was literally true ; Wapping or Radcliff being no part either of the city or liberties.

This certificate, directed to the next constable, that was at Hummerton, [Homerton,] one of the hamlets of the parish of Hackney, was so serviceable to them that it procured them not a free passage there only, but a full certificate of health from a justice of the peace ; who, upon the constable's application, granted it without much difficulty ; and thus they passed through the long divided town of Hackney, (for it lay then in several separated hamlets,) and travelled on till they came into the great north road on the top of Stamford-hill.

By this time they began to be weary, and so in the back road from Hackney, a little before it opened into the said great road, they resolved to set up their tent, and encamp for the first night; which they did accordingly, with the addition, that, finding a barn, or a building like a barn, and first searching as well as they could, to be sure there was nobody in it, they set up their tent, with the head of it against the barn. This they did also because the wind blew that night very high, and they were but young at such a way of lodging, as well as at the managing their tent.

Here they went to sleep, but the joiner, a grave and sober man, and not pleased with their lying at this loose rate, the first night could not sleep, and resolved, after trying to sleep to no purpose, that he would get out, and taking the gun in his hand, stand sentinel, and guard his companions: so, with the gun in his hand, he walked to and again before the barn, for that stood in the field near the road, but within the hedge. He had not been long upon the scout, but he heard a noise of people coming on as if it had been a great number, and they came on, as he thought, directly towards the barn. He did not presently awake his companions, but in a few minutes more their noise growing louder and louder, the biscuit-baker called to him and asked him what was the matter, and quickly started out to: the other being the lame sail-maker, and most weary, lay still in the tent.

As they expected, so the people whom they had heard came on directly to the barn, when one of our travellers challenged, like soldiers upon the guard, with—"Who comes there?" The people did not answer immediately, but one of them speaking to another that was behind him,—“Alas! alas! we are all disappointed,” says he, "here are some people before us, the barn is taken up."

They all stopped upon that as under some surprise, and it seems there were about thirteen of them in all, and some women among them. They consulted together what they should do, and by their discourse our travellers soon found they were poor distressed people too, like themselves, seeking shelter and safety; and besides, our travellers had no need to be afraid of their coming up to disturb them; for as soon as they heard the words,— "Who comes there?" these could hear the women say, as if frightened,— "Do not go near them: how do you know but they may have the Plague?" And when one of the men said,— "Let us but speak to them;" the woman said,— "No, don't, by any means, we have escaped thus far by the goodness of God, do not let us run into danger now, we beseech you."

Our travellers found by this that they were a good sober sort of people, and fleeing for their lives, as they were; and as they were encouraged by it, so John said to the joiner, his comrade, "Let us encourage them, too, as much as we can:" so he called to them: "Hark ye, good people, says the joiner, "we find by our talk, that you are fleeing from the same dreadful enemy as we are; do not be afraid of us, we are only three poor men of us; if you are free from the distemper you shall not be hurt by us: we are not in the barn, but in a little tent here on the outside, and we will remove for you, we can set up our tent again immediately any where else;" and upon this a parley began between the joiner, whose name was Richard, and one of their men, who said his name was Ford.

FORD.—“ And do you assure us that you are all sound men ? ”

RICHARD.—“ Nay, we are all concerned to tell you of it, that you may not be uneasy or think yourselves in danger ; but you see we do not desire you should put yourselves into any danger ; and therefore I tell you, that we have not made use of the barn, so we will remove from it that you may be safe and we also.”

FORD.—“ That is very kind and charitable ; but if we have reason to be satisfied that you are sound and free from the visitation, why should we make you remove now you are settled in your lodging, and it may be, are laid down to rest ? We will go into the barn, if you please, to rest ourselves a while, and we need not disturb you.”

RICHARD.—“ Well, but you are more than we are : I hope you will assure us that you are all of you sound too, for the danger is as great from you to us, as from us to you.”

FORD.—“ Blessed be God that some do escape, though it is but few ; what may be our portion still we know not, but hitherto we are preserved.”

RICHARD.—“ What part of the town do you come from ? Was the Plague come to the places where you lived ? ”

FORD.—“ Ay, ay, in a most frightful and terrible manner, or else we had not fled away as we do ; but we believe there will be very few left alive behind us.”

RICHARD.—“ What part do you come from ? ”

FORD.—“ We are most of us of Cripplegate parish, only two or three of Clerkenwell parish, but on the hither side.”

RICHARD.—“ How then was it that you came away no sooner ? ”

FORD.—“We have been away some time, and kept together as well as we could at the hither end of Islington, where we got leave to lie in an old uninhabited house, and had some bedding and conveniences of our own that we brought with us, but the Plague is come up into Islington too, and a house next door to our poor dwelling was infected and shut up, and we are come away in a fright.”*

RICHARD.—“And what way are you going?”

FORD.—“As our lot shall cast us.—We know not whither,—but God will guide those that look up to him.”

They parleyed no farther at that time, but came all up to the barn, and with some difficulty got into it: there was nothing but hay in the barn, but it was almost full of that, and they accommodated themselves as well as they could, and went to rest; but our travellers observed, that before they went to sleep, an ancient man, who it seems was father of one of the women, went to prayer with all the company, recommending themselves to the blessing and direction of Providence, before they went to sleep.

It was soon day at that time of the year; and as Richard the joiner had kept guard the first part of the night, so John the soldier relieved him, and he had the post in the morning, and they began to be acquainted with one another. It seems when they left Islington, they intended to have gone north, away to Highgate, but were stopped at Holloway, and there they would not let them pass; so they crossed over the fields and hills to the eastward, and came out at the Boarded-river,* and so, avoiding the town, they left Hornsey on the left hand, and Newington on the right hand, and came into the great road about Stamford-hill on that side, as the three travellers had done on the other side; and now they had thoughts of going over the river [the Lea] in the marshes, and make forwards to Epping Forest, where they hoped they should get leave to rest. It seems they were not poor, at least not so poor as to be in want; they had enough to subsist them moderately for two or three months, when, as they said, they were in hopes the cold weather would check the infection, or at least the violence of it would have spent itself, and would abate, if it were only for want of people left alive to be infected.

* In Islington, according to the bills, about 700 persons died of the Plague in the course of the year. The first death occurred in the weekly bill from the 13th to the 20th of June, from which time the infection gradually increased until September, when it was at its height in every part of the metropolis.

This was much the fate of our three travellers, only that they seemed to be the better furnished for travelling, and had it in their view to go farther off; for, as to the first, they did not propose to go farther than one day's journey, so that they might have intelligence every two or three days how things were at London.

But here our travellers found themselves under an unexpected inconvenience, namely, that of their horse, for by means of the horse to carry their baggage they were obliged to keep in the road; whereas, the people of this other band went over the fields or roads, path or no path, way or no way, as they pleased; neither had they any occasion to pass through any town, or come near any town, other than to buy such things as they wanted for their necessary subsistence, and in that, indeed, they were put to much difficulty;—of which in its place.

* The Boarded-river was a part of the New River so called, near Hornsey-wood House; where, formerly, the water was conveyed over a low valley in a sort of trough.

But our three travellers were obliged to keep the road, or else they must commit spoil, and do the country a great deal of damage in breaking down fences and gates, to go over enclosed fields, which they were loath to do if they could help it.

Our three travellers, however, had a great mind to join themselves to this company, and take their lot with them; and after some discourse, they laid aside their first design which looked northward, and resolved to follow the other into Essex; so in the morning they took up their tent, and loaded their horse, and away they travelled altogether.

They had some difficulty in passing the ferry at the river side, the ferry-man being afraid of them; but after some parley at a distance, the ferry-man was content to bring his boat to a place distant from the usual ferry, and leave it there for them to take it; so putting themselves over, he directed them to leave the boat, and he having another boat, said he would fetch it again, which it seems, however, he did not do for above eight days.

Here, giving the ferry-man money before-hand, they had a supply of victuals and drink, which he brought and left in the boat for them, but not without, as I said, having received the money before-hand. But now our travellers were at a great loss and difficulty how to get the horse over, the boat being small, and not fit for it; and at last could not do it without unloading the baggage, and making him swim over.

From the river they travelled towards the forest, but when they came to Walthamstow, the people of that town denied to admit them, as was the case everywhere. The constables and their watchmen kept them off at a distance, and parleyed with them; they gave the same account of themselves as before, but these gave no credit to what they said, giving it for a reason that two or three companies had already come that way, and made the like pretences, but that they had given several people the distemper in the towns where they had passed, and had been afterwards so hardly used by the country, (though with justice too, as they had deserved,) that about Brentwood, or that way, several of them perished in the fields, whether of the plague, or of mere want and distress, they could not tell.

This was a good reason indeed why the people of Walthamstow should be very cautious, and why they should resolve not to entertain anybody that they were not well satisfied of. But as Richard the joiner, and one of the other men who parleyed with them told them, it was no reason why they should block up the roads, and refuse to let people pass through the town, and who asked nothing of them but to go through the street: that if their people were afraid of them, they might go into their houses and shut their doors; they would neither shew them civility nor incivility, but go on about their business.

The constables and attendants, not to be persuaded by reason, continued obstinate and would hearken to nothing; so the two men that talked with them went back to their fellows to consult what was to be done. It was very discouraging in the whole, and they knew not what to do for a good while; but at last John the soldier and biscuit-baker, considering awhile,—“Come,” says he, “leave the rest of the parley to me.” He had not appeared yet, so he sets the joiner, Richard, to work, to cut some poles out of the trees, and shape them as like guns as they could, and in a little time he had five or six fair muskets, which, at a distance would not be known; and about the part where the lock of a gun is, he caused them to wrap cloth and rags, such as they had, as soldiers do in wet weather, to preserve the locks of their pieces from rust, the rest was discoloured with clay or mud, such as they could get; and all this while the rest of them sat under the trees by his direction, in two or three bodies, where they made fires at a good distance from one another.

While this was doing, he advanced himself and two or three with him, and set up their tent in the lane within sight of the barrier which the town's men had made, and set a sentinel just by it with the real gun, the only one they had, and who walked to and fro with the gun on his shoulder, so as that the people of the town might see them; also he tied the horse to a gate in the hedge just by, and got some dry sticks together and kindled a fire on the other side of the tent, so that the people of the town could see the fire and the smoke, but could not see what they were doing at it.

After the country people had looked upon them very earnestly a great while, and, by all that they could see, could not but suppose that they were a great many in company, they began to be uneasy, not for their going away, but for staying where they were; and above all, perceiving they had horses and arms, for they had seen one horse and one gun at the tent, and they had seen others of them walk about the field on the inside of the hedge, by the side of the lane with their muskets (as they took them to be) shouldered;—I say, upon such a sight as this, you may be assured they were alarmed and terribly frightened; and it seems they went to a Justice of the Peace to know what they should do. What the Justice advised them to I know not, but towards the evening they called from the barrier, as above, to the sentinel at the tent.

“Why, what do you intend to do?” says the constable.

“To do!” says John, “what would you have us to do?”

CONSTABLE.—“Why don’t you be gone—what do you stay there for?”

JOHN.—“Why do you stop us on the king’s highway, and refuse us leave to go on our way?”

CONSTABLE.—“We are not bound to tell you our reason; though we did let you know it was because of the Plague.”

JOHN.—“We told you we were all sound and free from the Plague, which we were not bound to have satisfied you of, and yet you pretend to stop us on the highway!”

CONSTABLE.—“We have a right to stop it up, and our own safety obliges us to it; besides, this is not the king’s highway, it is a way upon sufferance: you see here is a gate, and if we do let people pass here we make them pay toll.”

JOHN.—“We have a right to seek our own safety as well as you; and you may see we are fleeing for our lives, and it is very unchristian and unjust to stop us.”

CONSTABLE.—“You may go back from whence you came; we do not hinder you from that.”

JOHN.—“No, it is a stronger enemy than you that keeps us from doing that; or else we should not ha’ come hither.”

CONSTABLE.—“Well, you may go any other way then.”

JOHN.—“No, no; I suppose you see we are able to send you going, and all the people of your parish, and come through your town when we will; but since

* It seems John was in the tent, but hearing them call he steps out, and taking the gun upon his shoulder, talked to them as if he had been the sentinel placed there upon the guard by some officer that was his superior.

you have stopped us here, we are content. You see, we have encamped here, and here we will live; we hope you will furnish us with victuals."

CONSTABLE.—"We furnish you! what mean you by that?"

JOHN.—"Why, you would not have us starve, would you? if you stop us here, you must keep us."

CONSTABLE.—"You will be ill kept at our maintenance."

JOHN.—"If you stint us, we shall make ourselves the better allowance."

CONSTABLE.—"Why, you will not pretend to quarter upon us by force, will you?"

JOHN.—"We have offered no violence to you yet; why do you seem to oblige us to it? I am an old soldier, and cannot starve; and if you think that we shall be obliged to go back for want of provisions, you are mistaken."

CONSTABLE.—"Since you threaten us, we shall take care to be strong enough for you: I have orders to raise the county upon you."

JOHN.—"It is you that threaten, not we: and since you are for mischief, you cannot blame us if we do not give you time for it; we shall begin our march in a few minutes."*

CONSTABLE.—"What is it you demand of us?"

JOHN.—"At first we desired nothing of you, but leave to go through the town; we should have offered no injury to any of you, neither would you have had any injury or loss by us. We are not thieves, but poor people in distress, and flying from the dreadful plague in London, which devours thousands every week. We wonder how you could be so unmerciful!"

* This so frightened the constable and the people that were with him, that they immediately changed their note.

CONSTABLE.—“Self-preservation obliges us.”

JOHN.—“What! to shut up your compassion in a case of such distress as this?”

CONSTABLE.—“Well, if you will pass over the fields on your left hand, and behind that part of the town, I will endeavour to have gates opened for you.”

JOHN.—“Our horsemen* cannot pass with our baggage that way; it does not lead into the road that we want to go: and why should you force us out of the road? Besides, you have kept us here all day without any provisions but such as we brought with us; I think you ought to send us some provisions for our relief.”

CONSTABLE.—“If you will go another way, we will send you some provisions.”

JOHN.—“That is the way to have all the towns in the county stop up the ways against us.”

CONSTABLE.—“If they all furnish you with food, what will you be the worse; I see you have tents, you want no lodging.”

JOHN.—“Well, what quantity of provisions will you send us?”

CONSTABLE.—“How many are you?”

JOHN.—“Nay, we do not ask enough for all our company, we are in three companies; if you will send us bread for twenty men, and about six or seven women, for three days, and shew us the way over the field you speak of, we desire not to put your people into any fear for us; we will go out of our way to oblige you, though we are as free from infection as you are.”

CONSTABLE.—“And will you assure us that your other people shall offer us no new disturbance?”

JOHN.—“No, no, you may depend on it.”

* They had but one horse among them.

CONSTABLE.—“You must oblige yourself too, that none of your people shall come a step nearer than where the provisions we send you shall be set down.”

JOHN.—“I answer for it we will not.”*

Accordingly, they sent to the place twenty loaves of bread, and three or four large pieces of good beef, and opened some gates, through which they passed; but none of them had courage so much as to look out to see them go, and as it was evening, if they had looked they could not have seen them so as to know how few they were.

This was John the soldier's management. But this gave such an alarm to the county, that had they really been two or three hundred, the whole county would have been raised upon them; and they would have been sent to prison, or perhaps knocked on the head.

They were soon made sensible of this, for two days afterwards they found several parties of horsemen, and footmen also, about, in pursuit of three companies of men armed, as they said, with muskets, who were broke out from London, and had the Plague upon them; and that were not only spreading the distemper among the people, but plundering the country.

As they knew now the consequence of their case, they soon saw the danger they were in, so they resolved, by the advice also of the old soldier, to divide themselves again. John and his two comrades, with the horse, went away as if towards Waltham; the other in two companies, but all a little asunder, went towards Epping.

The first night they encamped all in the forest, and not far off one another, but not setting up the tent, lest that should discover them; on the other hand, Richard went to work with his axe and his hatchet, and cutting down branches of trees, he built three tents or hovels, in which they all encamped with as much convenience as they could expect.

The provisions they had at Walthamstow served them very plentifully this night, and as for the next they left it to Providence; they had fared so well with the old soldier's conduct, that they now willingly made him their leader; and the first of his conduct appeared to be very good. He told them that they were now at a proper distance enough from London: that as they need not be immediately beholden to the country for relief, so they ought to be as careful the country did not infect them as that they did not infect the country; that what little money they had, they must be as frugal of as they could; that as he would not have them think of offering the country any violence, so they must endeavour to make the sense of their condition go as far with the country as it could. They all referred themselves to his direction; so they left their three houses standing, and the next day went away towards Epping; the captain also, for so they now called him, and his two fellow-travellers laid aside their design of going to Waltham, and all went together.

When they came near Epping they halted, choosing out a proper place in the open forest, not very near the highway, but not far out of it on the north side, under a little cluster of low pollard trees; here they pitched their little camp, which consisted of three large tents or huts made of poles, which their carpenter, and such as were his assistants, cut down and fixed in the ground in a circle, binding all the small ends together at the top, and thickening the sides with boughs of trees and bushes, so that they were completely close and warm. They had, besides this, a little tent where the women lay by themselves, and a hut to put the horse in.

It happened that the next day, or next but one, was market day at Epping, when Capt. John and one of the other men went to market and bought some provisions, that is to say, bread, and some mutton and beef, and two of the women went separately as if they had not belonged to the rest, and bought more. John took the horse to bring it home, and the sack (which the carpenter carried his tools in) to put it in; the carpenter went to work and made them benches and stools to sit on, such as the wood he could get would afford, and a kind of a table to dine on.

They were taken no notice of for two or three days, but after that, abundance of people ran out of the town to look at them, and all the country was alarmed about them. The people at first seemed afraid to come near them, and on the other hand, they desired the people to keep off, for there was a rumour that the Plague was at Waltham, and that it had been in Epping two or three days. So John called out to them not to come to them; "for," says he "we are all whole and sound people here, and we would not have you bring the Plague among us, nor pretend we brought it among you."

After this the parish officers came up to them and parleyed with them at a distance, and desired to know who they were, and by what authority they pretended to fix their stand at that place? John answered very frankly, they were poor distressed people from London, who, foreseeing the misery they should be reduced to if the Plague spread into the city, had fled out in time for their lives, and having no acquaintance or relations to fly to, had first taken up at Islington, but the Plague being come into that town, were fled further; and as they supposed that the people of Epping might have refused them coming into their town, they had pitched their tents thus in the open field, and in the forest, being willing to bear all the hardships of such a disconsolate lodging, rather than have any one think, or be afraid, that they should receive injury by them.

At first the Epping people talked roughly to them, and told them they must remove; that this was no place for them; and that they pretended to be sound and well, but that they might be infected with the Plague, for aught they knew, and might infect the whole country, and they could not suffer them there.

John argued very calmly with them a great while, and told them—"That London was the place by which they, that is, the townsmen of Epping and all the country round them, sold the produce of their lands, and out of whom they subsisted; by whom they made the rent of their farms; and to be so cruel to the inhabitants of London, or to any of those by whom they gained so much, was very hard, and they would be loath to have it remembered hereafter, and have it told how barbarous, how un hospitable, and how unkind they were to the people of London, when they fled from the face of the most terrible enemy in the world; that it would be enough to make the name of an Epping man hateful through all the city, and to have the rabble stone them in the very streets whenever they came so much as to market; that they were not yet secure from being visited themselves, and that as he heard Waltham was already; that they would think it very hard that when any of them fled for fear before they were touched, they should be denied the liberty of lying so much as in the open fields."

The Epping men told them again—"That they, indeed, said they were sound and free from the infection, but that they had no assurance of it; and that it was reported, that there had been a great rabble of people at Walthamstow, who made such pretensions of being sound, as they did, but that they threatened to plunder the town, and force their way, whether the parish officers would or not; that they were near 200 of them, and had arms and tents like Low Country soldiers: that they extorted provisions from the town by threatening them with living upon them at free quarter, showing their arms and talking in the language of soldiers; and that several of them being gone away to Rumford and Brentwood, the country had been infected by them, and the Plague spread into both those large towns, so that the people durst not go to market there as usual; that it was very likely they were some of that party; and if so, they deserved to be sent to the county jail, and be secured till they had made satisfaction for the damage they had done, and for the terror and fright they had put the country into."

John answered—"That what other people had done was nothing to them; that they assured them they were all of one company; that they had never been more in number than they saw them at that time (which by the way was very true); that they came out in two separate companies, but joined by the way, their cases being the same; that they were ready to give what account of themselves anybody could desire of them, and to give in their names and places of abode, that so they might be called to an account for any disorder that they might be guilty of; that the townsmen might see they were content to live hardly, and only desired a little room to breathe in on the forest, where it was wholesome; for where it was not they could not stay, and would decamp if they found it otherwise there."

"But," said the townsmen, "we have a great charge of poor upon our hands already, and we must take care not to increase it; we suppose you can give us no security against your being chargeable to our parish and to the inhabitants, any more than you can of being dangerous to us as to the infection."

"Why, look you," says John, "as to being chargeable to you, we hope we shall not; if you will relieve us with provisions for our present necessity, we will be very thankful: as we all lived without charity when we were at home, so we will oblige ourselves fully to repay you, if God please to bring us back to our own families and houses in safety, and to restore health to the people of London.

"As to our dying here, we assure you, if any of us die, we that survive will bury them and put you to no expense, except it should be that we should all die, and then, indeed, the last man not being able to bury himself, would put you to that single expense, which I am persuaded," says John, "he would leave enough behind him to pay you for the expense of.

"On the other hand," says John, "if you will shut up all bowels of compassion and not relieve us at all, we shall not extort anything by violence, or steal from any one; but when what little we have is spent, if we perish for want, God's will be done."

John wrought so upon the townsmen by talking thus rationally and smoothly to them, that they went away; and though they did not give any consent to their staying there, yet they did not molest them ; and the poor people continued there three or four days longer without any disturbance. In this time they had got some remote acquaintance at a victualling house at the outskirts of the town, to whom they called at a distance to bring some little things that they wanted, and which they caused to be set down at a distance, and always paid for very honestly.

During this time the younger people of the town came frequently pretty near them, and would stand and look at them, and sometimes talk with them at some space between ; and particularly after it was observed, that on the first Sabbath-day the poor people kept retired, worshipped God together, and were heard to sing psalms.

These things, and a quiet inoffensive behaviour, began to get them the good opinion of the country, and people began to pity them and to speak very well of them ; the consequence of which was, that upon the occasion of a very wet rainy night, a certain gentleman who lived in the neighbourhood, sent them a little cart with twelve trusses or bundles of straw, as well for them to lodge upon, as to cover and thatch their huts, and to keep them dry. The minister of a parish too, not far off, not knowing of the other, sent them also about two bushels of wheat and half a bushel of white peas.

They were very thankful to be sure for this relief, and particularly the straw was a very great comfort to them ; for though the ingenious carpenter had made frames for them to lie in like troughs, and filled them with leaves of trees, and such things as they could get, and had cut all their tent-cloth out to make them coverlids, yet they lay damp, and hard, and unwholesome, till this straw came, which was to them like feather-beds ; and, as John said,

This gentleman and the minister having thus begun, and given an example of charity to these wanderers, others quickly followed, and they received every day some benevolence or other from the people, but chiefly from the gentlemen who dwelt in the country round about; some sent them chairs, stools, tables, and such household things as they gave notice they wanted; some sent them blankets, rugs, and coverlids; some earthenware; and some kitchenware for ordering their food.

Encouraged by this good usage, their capenter, in a few days, built them a large shed or house with rafters, and a roof in form, and an upper floor, in which they lodged warm, for the weather began to be damp and cold in the beginning of September; but this house being very well thatched, and the sides and roof made very thick, kept out the cold well enough. He made also an earthen wall at one end with a chimney in it; and another of the company, with a vast deal of trouble and pains, made a funnel to the chimney to carry out the smoke.

Here they lived comfortably, though coarsely, till the middle of September, when they had the bad news to hear, whether true or not, that the Plague which was very hot at Waltham Abbey on one side, and at Romford and Brentwood on the other side, was also come to Epping, to Woodford, and to most of the townes upon the forest, and which, as they said, was brought down among them chiefly by the higglers, and such people as went to and from London with provisions.

If this was true, it was an evident contradiction to that report which was afterwards spread all over England, but which, as I have said, I cannot confirm of my own knowledge, namely, that the market-people, carrying provisions to the city, never got the infection, nor carried it back into the country; both which, I have been assured, was false.

It might be that they were preserved even beyond expectation, though not to a miracle; that abundance [of dealers] went and came, and were not touched; and that was much for the encouragement of the poor people of London, who had been completely miserable if the people that brought provisions to the markets had not been many times wonderfully preserved; or, at least more preserved than could be reasonably expected.

But now these new inmates began to be disturbed more effectually; for the towns about them were really infected, and they began to be afraid to trust one another so much as to go abroad for such things as they wanted; and this pinched them very hard, for now they had little or nothing but what the charitable gentlemen of the country supplied them with; but, for their encouragement it happened, that other gentlemen in the country, who had not sent them anything before, began to hear of them and supply them, and one sent them a large pig, that is to say, a porker; another, two sheep; and another sent them a calf; in short, they had meat enough, and sometimes had cheese and milk, and all such things. They were chiefly put to it for bread; for when the gentlemen sent them corn they had nowhere to bake it, or to grind it: this made them eat the first two bushels of wheat that was sent them in parched corn, as the Israelites of old did, without grinding or making bread of it.

At last they found means to carry their corn to a wind-mill, near Woodford, where they had it ground; and afterwards the biscuit-baker made a hearth so hollow and dry that he could make biscuit cakes tolerably well; and thus they came into a condition to live without any assistance or supplies from the towns: and it is well they did, for the country was soon after fully infected, and about 120 were said to have died of the distemper in the villages near them, which was a terrible thing to them.

On this they called a new council; and now the towns had no need to be afraid they should settle near them, but on the contrary several families of the poorer sort of the inhabitants quitted their houses and built huts in the forest after the same manner as they had done: but it was observed, that several of these poor people that had so removed had the sickness even in their huts or booths; the reason of which was plain, namely, not because they removed into the air, but because they did not remove time enough, that is to say, not till, by openly conversing with the other people, their neighbours, they had the distemper upon them, or (as may be said) among them, and so carried it about them whither they went:—or, secondly, because they were not careful enough after they were safely removed out of the towns, not to come in again and mingle with the diseased people.

But be it which of these it will, when our travellers began to perceive that the Plague was not only in the towns, but even in the tents and huts on the forest near them, they began then not only to be afraid, but to think of decamping and removing; for had they stayed, they would have been in manifest danger of their lives.

It is not to be wondered that they were greatly afflicted at being obliged to quit the place where they had been so kindly received, and where they had been treated with so much humanity and charity; but necessity, and the hazard of life, which they came out so far to preserve, prevailed with them, and they saw no remedy. John, however, thought of a remedy for their present misfortune, namely, that he would first acquaint that gentleman, who was their principal benefactor, with the distress they were in, and crave his assistance and advice.

The good charitable gentleman encouraged them to quit the place, for fear they should be cut off from any retreat at all by the violence of the distemper; but whither they should go, that he found very hard to direct them to. At last John asked of him whether he (being a Justice of the Peace) would give them certificates of health to other Justices whom they might come before? that so, whatever might be their lot, they might not be repulsed now they had been all so long from London. This his worship immediately granted, and gave them proper letters of health, and from thence they were at liberty to travel whither they pleased.

Accordingly they had a full certificate of health intimating, that they had resided in a village in the county of Essex so long, that being examined and scrutinized sufficiently, and having been retired from all conversation for above forty days, without any appearance of sickness, they were therefore certainly concluded to be sound men, and might be safely entertained anywhere, having at last removed rather from fear of the Plague, which was come into such a town, than for having any signal of infection upon them, or upon any belonging to them.

With this certificate they removed, though with great reluctance; and John inclining not to go far from home, they moved towards the marshes on the side of Waltham: but here they found a man who, it seems, kept a wear or stop upon the river, made to raise the water for the barges which go up and down the river, and he terrified them with dismal stories of the sickness having been spread into all the towns on the river, and near the river, on the side of Middlesex and Hertfordshire—that is to say, into Waltham-cross, Enfield, and Ware, and all the towns on the road, that they were afraid to go that way; though it seems the man imposed upon them, for that the thing was not really true.

However it terrified them, and they resolved to move across the Forest towards Rumford and Brentwood; but they heard that there were numbers of people fled out of London that way, who lay up and down in the Forest called Henault Forest, reaching near Rumford, and who, having no subsistence or habitation, not only lived oddly and suffered great extremities in the woods and fields for want of relief, but were said to be made so desperate by those extremities as that they offered many violences to the county, robbed and plundered, and killed cattle, and the like; that others building huts and hovels by the roadside, begged, and that with an importunity next door to demanding relief; so that the county was very uneasy, and had been obliged to take some of them up.

This, in the first place, intimated to them that they would be sure to find the charity and kindness of the county, which they had found here where they were before, hardened and shut up against them; and that, on the other hand, they would be questioned wherever they came, and would be in danger of violence from others in like case as themselves.

Upon all these considerations, John, their captain, in all their names, went back to their good friend and benefactor who had relieved them before, and laying their case truly before him, humbly asked his advice; and he as kindly advised them to take up their old quarters again, or if not, to remove but a little further out of the road, and directed them to a proper place for them; and as they really wanted some house rather than huts to shelter them at that time of the year, it growing on towards Michaelmas, they found an old decayed house, which had been formerly some cottage or little habitation, but was so out of repair as to be scarce habitable, and by the consent of a farmer to whose farm it belonged, they got leave to make what use of it they could.

The ingenious joiner, and all the rest by his directions, went to work with it, and in a very few days made it capable to shelter them all, in case of bad weather; and in it there was an old chimney and an old oven, though both lying in ruins, yet they made them both fit for use, and raising additions, sheds, and lean-to's on every side, they soon made the house capable to hold them all.

They chiefly wanted boards to make window-shutters, floors, doors, and several other things; but as the gentleman above favoured them, and the country was by that means made easy with them, and above all, that they were known to be all sound and in good health, everybody helped them with what they could spare.

Here they encamped for good and all, and resolved to remove no more: they saw plainly how terribly alarmed that county was everywhere at anybody that came from London; and that they should have no admittance anywhere but with the utmost difficulty, at least no friendly reception and assistance as they had received here.

Now, although they received great assistance and encouragement from the country gentlemen and from the people round about them, yet they were put to great straits, for the weather grew cold and wet in October and November, and they had not been used to so much hardship; so that they got colds in their limbs, and distempers, but never had the infection.—And thus about December they came home to the city again.

I give this story thus at large, principally to account for the great numbers of people which immediately appeared in the city as soon as the sickness abated. For, as I have said, great numbers of those that were able and had retreats in the country, fled to those retreats: so when it was increased to such a frightful extremity as I have related, the middling people who had not friends, fled to all parts of the country where they could get shelter, as well those that had money to relieve themselves as those that had not. Those that had money always fled farthest, because they were able to subsist themselves; but those who were empty suffered, as I have said, great hardships, and were often driven by necessity to relieve their wants at the expense of the country. By that means the country was made very uneasy at them, and sometimes took them up, though even then they scarce knew what to do with them, and were always very backward to punish them; but often too they forced them from place to place, till they were obliged to come back again to London.

I have, since my knowing this story of John and his brother, inquired and found that there were a great many of the poor disconsolate people, as above, who fled into the country every way; and some of them got little sheds, and barns, and out-houses to live in, where they could obtain so much kindness of the country, and especially where they had any the least satisfactory account to give of themselves, and particularly that they did not come out of London too late. But others, and that in great numbers, built themselves little huts and retreats in the fields and woods, and lived like hermits in holes and caves, or any place they could find; and where, we may be sure, they suffered great extremities, such, indeed, that many of them were obliged to come back again, whatever the danger was; and so those little huts were often found empty, and the country people supposed the inhabitants lay dead in them of the Plague, and would not go near them for fear—no, not in a great while. Nor is it unlikely but that some of the unhappy wanderers might die so all alone, even sometimes for want of help; as particularly in one tent or hut, where was found a man dead, and on the gate of a field just by, was cut with his knife in uneven letters, the following words,—by which it may be supposed the other man escaped, or that one dying first, the other buried him as well as he could:—

O m I s E r Y !

W o E, W o E.

I have given an account already of what I found to have been the case down the river among the seafaring men; how the ships lay in the offing, as it is called, in rows, or lines, astern of one another, quite down from the pool as far as I could see. I have been told that they lay in the same manner quite down the river as low as Gravesend, and some far beyond, even everywhere, or in every place where they could ride with safety as to wind and weather; nor did I ever hear that the Plague reached to any of the people on board those ships, except such as lay up in the pool, or as high as Deptford Reach, although the people went frequently on shore to the country towns and villages, and farmers' houses, to buy fresh provisions, fowls, pigs, calves, and the like, for their supply.

Likewise I found that the watermen on the river above the bridge* found means to convey themselves away up the river, as far as they could go; and that they had, many of them, their whole families in their boats, covered with tilts and bales, as they call them, and furnished with straw within for their lodging; and that they lay thus all along by the shore in the marshes, some of them setting up little tents with their sails, and so lying under them on shore in the day, and going into their boats at night; and in this manner, as I have heard, the river sides were lined with boats and people as long as they had anything to subsist on, or could get anything of the country; and indeed the country people, as well gentlemen as others, on these and all other occasions were very forward to relieve them, but they were by no means willing to receive them into their towns and houses, and for that we cannot blame them.

There was one unhappy citizen within my knowledge who had been visited in a dreadful manner, so that his wife and all his children were dead, and himself and two servants only left with an elderly woman, a near relation, who had nursed those that were dead as well as she could: this disconsolate man goes to a village near the town, though not within the bills of mortality, and finding an empty house there, inquires out the owner, and took the house. After a few days he got a cart and loaded it with goods, and carried them down to the house; the people of the village opposed his driving the cart along, but with some arguings, and some force, the men that drove the cart along, got through the street up to the door of the house; there the constable resisted them again, and would not let them be brought in. The man caused the goods to be unloaden and laid at the door, and sent the cart away: upon which they carried the man before a justice of peace; that is to say, they commanded him to go, which he did. The justice ordered him to cause the cart to fetch away the goods again, which he refused to do; upon which the justice ordered the constable to pursue the carters and fetch them back, and make them reload the goods and carry them away, or to set them in the stocks till they came for farther orders; and if they could not find them, nor the man would not consent to take them away, they should cause them to be drawn with hooks from the house door and burnt in the street. The poor distressed man upon this fetched the goods again, but with grievous cries and lamentations at the hardship of his case. But there was no remedy; self-preservation obliged the people to those severities, which they would not otherwise have been concerned in. Whether this poor man lived or died I cannot tell, but it was reported that he had the Plague upon him at that time; and, perhaps the people might report that to justify their usage of him; but it was not unlikely, that either he or his goods, or both, were dangerous, when his whole family had been dead of the distemper so little a while before.

*That is, London Bridge: it should be recollected that there was no other metropolitan bridge until Westminster bridge was erected, between the years 1738 and 1747

I know that the inhabitants of the towns adjacent to London were much blamed for cruelty to the poor people that rau from the contagion in their distress; and many very severe things were done, as may be seen from what has been said; but I cannot but say, also, that where there was room for charity and assistance to the people, without apparent danger to themselves, they were willing enough to help and relieve them. But as all the towns were indeed judges in their own case, so the poor people who ran abroad in their extremities were often ill-used and driven back again into the town (or London); and this caused infinite exclamations and outcries against the country towns, and made the clamour very popular.

And yet more or less, maugre all the caution, there was not a town of any note within ten (or, I believe, twenty) miles of the city, but what was more or less infected, and had some died among them. I have heard the accounts of several; such as they were reckoned up as follows:—

Another thing might render the country more strict with respect to the citizens, and especially with respect to the poor; and this was what I hinted at before, namely, that there was a seeming propensity, or a wicked inclination in those that were infected, to infect others.

There have been great debates among our physicians as to the reason of this: some will have it to be in the nature of the disease, and that it impresses every one that is seized upon by it with a kind of a rage, and a hatred against their own kind; as if there was a malignity, not only in the distemper to communicate itself, but in the very nature of man, prompting him with evil will, or an evil eye,—as they say in the case of a mad dog, who, though the gentlest creature before of any of his kind, yet then will fly upon and bite any one that comes next him, and those as soon as any, who have been most observed by him before.

Others placed it to the account of the corruption of human nature, which cannot bear to see itself more miserable than others of its own species, and has a kind of involuntary wish, that all men were as unhappy, or in as bad a condition as itself.

Others say it was only a kind of desperation, not knowing or regarding what they did, and consequently unconcerned at the danger or safety, not only of anybody near them, but even of themselves also. And, indeed, when men are once come to a condition to abandon themselves, and be unconcerned for the safety, or at the danger of themselves, it cannot be so much wondered at that they should be careless of the safety of other people.

But I choose to give this grave debate a quite different turn, and answer it, or resolve it all, by saying, “that I do not grant the fact.” On the contrary, I say that the thing is not really so, but that it was a general complaint raised by the people inhabiting the out-lying villages against the citizens, to justify, or at least excuse, those hardships and severities so much talked of, and in which complaints, both sides may be said to have injured one another;—that is to say, the citizens pressing to be received and harboured in time of distress, and with the plague upon them, complain of the cruelty and injustice of the country people, in being refused entrance, and forced back again with their goods and families; and the inhabitants finding themselves so imposed upon, and the citizens breaking in, as it were, upon them, whether they would or no, complain, that when they were infected, they were not only regardless of others, but even willing to infect them : neither of which was really true, that is to say, in the colours they were described in.

It is true, there is something to be said for the frequent alarms which were given to the country, of the resolution of the people of London to come out by force, not only for relief, but to plunder and rob ; that they ran about the streets with the distemper upon them without any control ; and that no care was taken to shut up houses, and confine the sick people from infecting others ; whereas, to do the Londoners justice, they never practised such things, except in such particular cases as I have mentioned above, and such like. On the other hand, every thing was managed with so much care, and such excellent order was observed in the whole city and suburbs, by the care of the Lord Mayor and aldermen, and by the Justices of the peace, churchwardens, &c. in the out-parts, that London may be a pattern to all the cities in the world for the good government and the excellent order that was everywhere kept, even in the time of the most violent infection, and when the people were in the utmost consternation and distress. But of this I shall speak by itself.

One thing, it is to be observed, was owing principally to the prudence of the magistrates, and ought to be mentioned to their honour, viz., the moderation which they used in the great and difficult work of shutting up of houses. It is true, as I have mentioned, that the shutting up of houses was a great subject of discontent, and I may say, indeed, the only subject of discontent among the people at that time ; for the confining the sound in the same house with the sick, was counted very terrible, and the complaints of people so confined were very grievous; they were heard into the very streets, and they were sometimes such that called for resentment, though oftener for compassion. They had no way to converse with any of their friends but out at their windows, where they would make such pitèous lamentations, as often moved the hearts of those they talked with, and of others who, passing by, heard their story: and as those complaints oftentimes reproached the severity, and sometimes the insolence of the watchmen placed at their doors, those watchmen would answer saucily enough, and perhaps be apt to affront the people who were in the street talking to the said families; for which, or for their ill-treatment of the families, I think seven or eight of them in several places were killed; I know not whether I should say murdered or not, because I cannot enter into the particular cases. It is true, the watchmen were on their duty, and acting in the post where they were placed by a lawful authority; and killing any public legal officer in the execution of his office, is always in the language of the law called murder. But as they were not authorized by the magistrates' instructions, nor by the power they acted under, to be injurious or abusive, either to the people who were under their observation, or to any that concerned themselves for them; so when they did so, they might be said to act themselves, not their office; to act as private persons, not as persons employed; and consequently, if they brought mischief upon themselves by such an undue behaviour, that mischief was upon their own heads. Indeed, they had so much the hearty curses of the people, whether they deserved it or not, that whatever befel them, nobody pitied them, and everybody was apt to say they deserved it, whatever it was; nor do I remember that anybody was ever punished, at least to any considerable degree, for whatever was done to the watchmen that guarded their houses.

What variety of stratagems were used to escape and get out of houses thus shut up, by which the watchmen were deceived and overpowered, and that the people got away, I have taken notice of already, and shall say no more to that: but I say the magistrates did moderate and ease families upon many occasions in this case, and particularly in that of taking away or suffering to be removed the sick persons out of such houses, when they were willing to be removed either to a pest-house, or other places; and sometimes by giving the well persons in the family so shut up, leave to remove upon information given that they were well, and that they would confine themselves in such houses where they went, so long as should be required of them.* The concern also of the magistrates for the supplying such poor families as were infected; I say, supplying them with necessaries, as well physic as food, was very great, and in which they did not content themselves with giving the necessary orders to the officers appointed, but the aldermen in person, and on horseback frequently rode to such houses, and caused the people to be asked at their windows, whether they were duly attended or not? Also, whether they wanted anything that was necessary, and if the officers had constantly carried their messages, and fetched them such things as they wanted or not?—and if they answered in the affirmative, all was well; but if they complained that they were ill supplied, and that the officer did not do his duty, or did not treat them civilly, they (the officers) were generally removed, and others placed in their stead.

* In different parts of his work, De Foe delivers contradictory opinions as to the advantage or disadvantage of shutting up houses, where the inhabitants were affected. He also states (see page 65) in opposition to what he affirms above, that "there was no obtaining the least mitigation"—of the mischief resulting from such confinement—"by any application to Magistrates, or Government, at that time."

It is true, such complaint might be unjust, and if the officer had such arguments to use as would convince the magistrate that he was right, and that the people had injured him, he was continued, and they reproved. But this part could not bear a particular inquiry, for the parties could very ill be brought face to face, and a complaint could not be well heard and answered in the street, from the windows, as was the case then; the magistrates therefore generally chose to favour the people, and remove the man, as what seemed to be the least wrong, and of the least ill consequence; seeing, if the watchman was injured, yet they could easily make him amends by giving him another post of the like nature; but if the family was injured, there was no satisfaction could be made to them, the damage perhaps being irreparable, as it concerned their lives.

A great variety of these cases frequently happened between the watchmen and the poor people shut up, beside those I formerly mentioned about escaping; sometimes the watchmen were absent, sometimes drunk, sometimes asleep when the people wanted them, and such never failed to be punished severely, as indeed they deserved.

But after all that was or could be done in these cases, the shutting up of houses, so as to confine those that were well with those that were sick, had very great inconveniences in it, and some that were very tragical, and which merited to have been considered, if there had been room for it; but it was authorized by a law, it had the public good in view, as the end chiefly aimed at, and all the private injuries that were done by the putting it in execution, must be put to the account of the public benefit.

It is doubtful to this day, whether in the whole it contributed anything to the stop of the infection, and indeed, I cannot say it did; for nothing could run with greater fury and rage than the infection did when it was in its chief violence; though the houses infected were shut up as exactly, and as effectually as it was possible. Certain it is, that if all the infected persons were effectually shut in, no sound person could have been infected by them, because they could not have come near them. But the case was this, and I shall only touch it here, namely, that the infection was propagated insensibly, and by such persons as were not visibly infected, who neither knew who they infected, nor whom they were infected by.

A house in Whitechapel was shut up for the sake of one infected maid, who had only spots, not the tokens, come out upon her, and recovered; yet these people obtained no liberty to stir, neither for air nor exercise, forty days. Want of breath, fear, anger, vexation, and all the other griefs attending such an injurious treatment, cast the mistress of the family into a fever, and visitors came into the house, and said it was the Plague, though the physicians declared it was not; however, the family were obliged to begin their quarantine anew, on the report of the visitor or examiner, though their former quarantine wanted but a few days of being finished. This oppressed them so with anger and grief, and, as before, straitened them also so much as to room, and for want of breathing and free air, that most of the family fell sick, one of one distemper, one of another, chiefly scorbutic ailments; only one a violent colic, till after several prolongings of their confinement, some or other of those that came in with the visitors to inspect the persons that were ill, in hopes of releasing them, brought the distemper with them, and infected the whole house, and all or most of them died,—not of the Plague as really upon them before, but of the Plague that those people brought them, who should have been careful to have protected them from it; and this was a thing which frequently happened, and was indeed one of the worst consequences of shutting houses up.

I had about this time a little hardship put upon me, which I was at first greatly afflicted at, and very much disturbed about; though, as it proved, it did not expose me to any disaster; and this was being appointed, by the aldermen of Portsoken ward, one of the examiners of the houses in the precinct where I lived. We had a large parish, and had no less than eighteen examiners, as the order called us; the people called us visitors. I endeavoured with all my might to be excused from such an employment, and used many arguments with the alderman's deputy to be excused: particularly I alleged, that I was against shutting up houses at all, and that it would be very hard to oblige me to be an instrument in that which was against my judgment, and which I did verily believe would not answer the end it was intended for; but all the abatement I could get was only, that whereas the officer was appointed by my Lord Mayor to continue two months, I should be obliged to hold the office but three weeks; on condition, nevertheless, that I could then get some other sufficient housekeeper to serve the rest of the time for me, which was, in short, but a very small favour, it being very difficult to get any man to accept of such an employment, that was fit to be intrusted with it.

It is true, that shutting up of houses had one effect, which I am sensible was of moment, namely, it confined the distempered people, who would otherwise have been both very troublesome and very dangerous in their running about streets with the distemper upon them, which, when they were delirious, they would have done in a most frightful manner, and as indeed they began to do at first very much, till they were thus restrained;* nay, so very open they were, that the poor would go about and beg at people's doors, and say they had the Plague upon them, and beg rags for their sores, or both, or anything that delirious nature happened to think of.

A poor unhappy gentlewoman, a substantial citizen's wife, was (if the story be true) murdered by one of these creatures in Aldersgate-street, or that way: he was going along the street, raving mad to be sure, and singing; the people only said he was drunk, but he himself said he had the Plague upon him, which, it seems, was true; and meeting this gentlewoman, he would kiss her; she was terribly frightened, as he was only a rude fellow, and she ran from him, but the street being very thin of people, there was nobody near enough to help her: when she saw he would overtake her, she turned and gave him a * Similar exposures took place during the subsiding of the Pestilence, as we learn from the respective "Diaries" of Evelyn and Pepys. The former, under the date October 11th, says—"Went through the whole city, when having occasion to alight in several places about business of money, I was environed with multitudes of poor pestiferous creatures, begging alms: the shops universally shut up, a dreadful prospect." Pepys on the 16th of October wrote thus:—"Walked to the Tower; but Lord! how empty the streets are and melancholy, so many poor sick people in the streets full of sores; and so many sad stories overheard as I walk,—everybody talking of this dead, and that man sick, and so many in this place, and so many in that. And they tell me that in Westminster, there is never a Physician, and but one Apothecary left, all being dead; yet there are great hopes of a great decrease this week. God send it!"

thrust so forcibly, he being but weak, that it pushed him down backward. But very unhappily, she being so near, he caught hold of her, and pulled her down also; and getting up first, mastered her, and kissed her; and which was worst of all, when he had done, told her he had the Plague, and why should not she have it as well as he? She was frightened enough before, being also great with child; but when she heard him say he had the Plague, she screamed out and fell down in a swoon, or in a fit, which though she recovered a little, yet killed her in a very few days, and I never heard whether she had the Plague or no.*

Another infected person came and knocked at the door of a citizen's house, where they knew him very well; the servant let him in, and being told the master of the house was above, he ran up, and came into the room to them as the whole family was at supper. They began to rise up a little surprised, not knowing what the matter was, but he bid them sit still, he only came to take his leave of them. They asked him,—“why, Mr. —, where are you going?” “Going?” says he: “I have got the sickness and shall die to-morrow night.” It is easy to believe, though not to describe, the consternation they were all in; the women and the man's daughters, which were but little girls, were frightened almost to death, and got up, one running out at one door and one at another, some down stairs and some up stairs, and getting together as well as they could, locked themselves into their chambers, and screamed out at the window for help, as if they had been frightened out of their wits. The master, more composed than they, though both frightened and provoked, was going to lay hands on him, and throw him down stairs, being in a passion; but then considering a little the condition of the man, and the danger of touching him, horror seized his mind, and he stood still like one astonished. The poor distempered man all this while, being as well diseased in his brain as in his body, stood still like one amazed; at length he turns round: "Ay," says he, with all the seeming calmness imaginable, "is it so with you all? are you all disturbed at me? why then I'll e'en go home and die there:" and so he goes immediately down stairs. The servant that had let him in goes down after him with a candle, but was afraid to go past him and open the door, so he stood on the stairs to see what he would do; the man went and opened the door, and went out and flung the door after him. It was some while before the family recovered the fright, but as no ill consequence attended, they have had occasion since to speak of it (you may be sure) with great satisfaction. Though the man was gone, it was some time, nay, as I heard, some days, before they recovered themselves of the hurry they were in; nor did they go up and down the house with any assurance, till they had burnt a great variety of fumes and perfumes in all the rooms, and made a great many smokes of pitch, of gunpowder, and of sulphur, and till all had separately shifted, washed their clothes, and the like. As to the poor man, whether he lived or died I do not remember.

* There is a tale somewhat apposite to this, related by Fabricius, (“Misc. Cur.” Ann. II. Obs. 188,) as occurring in Holland, when the Plague raged there in 1636; and which Dr. Darwin has interwoven into one of his poems. Fabricius relates that during the Pestilence, a young girl, who was seized with it and had three carbuncles, was removed to a garden, where her lover, who was betrothed to her, attended her as nurse, and slept with her as his wife. He remained uninfected, and she recovered, and was married to him.

It is most certain that if, by the shutting up of houses, the sick had not been confined, multitudes who in the height of their fever were delirious and distracted, would have been continually running up and down the streets; and even as it was, a very great number did so, and offered all sorts of violence to those they met; even just as a mad dog runs on and bites at every one he meets: nor can I doubt but that should one of those infected diseased creatures have bitten any man or woman, while the frenzy of the distemper was upon them, they, I mean the person so wounded, would as certainly have been incurably infected as one that was sick before, and had the tokens upon him.*

I heard of one poor infected creature, who, running out of his bed in his shirt, in the anguish and agony of his swellings, of which he had three upon him, got his shoes on, and went to put on his coat, but the nurse resisting and snatching the coat from him, he threw her down, ran over her, ran down stairs, and into the street directly to the Thames in his shirt, the nurse running after him, and calling to the watch to stop him; but the watchman, frightened at the man, and afraid to touch him, let him go on. Upon which he ran down to the Steel-yard stairs, threw away his shirt, and plunged into the Thames, and, being a good swimmer, swam quite over the river; and the tide being come in, as they call it, that is running westward, he reached the land not till he came about the Falcon-stairs, where landing, and finding no people there, it being in the night, he ran about the streets there, naked as he was, for a good while, when, it being by that time high-water, he takes the river again, and swam back to the Steel-yard, landed, ran up the streets again to his own house, knocking at the door, went up the stairs, and into his bed again; and that this terrible experiment cured him of the Plague: that is to say, that the violent motion of his arms and legs stretched the parts where the swellings he had upon him were (that is to say, under his arms and his groin), and caused them to ripen and break; and that the cold of the water abated the fever in his blood.

I have only to add, that I do not relate this, any more than some of the other, as a fact within my own knowledge, so as that I can vouch the truth of them, and especially that of the man being cured by this extravagant adventure, which I confess I do not think very possible:* but it may serve to confirm the many desperate things which the distressed people—falling into deliriums, and what we call light-headedness—frequently run upon at that time, and how infinitely more such there would have been if such people had not been confined by the shutting up of houses; and this I take to be the best, if not the only good thing which was performed by that severe method.

* De Foe, as he often shows himself to have been too credulous, so he is here too sceptical. There are on record several authentic relations of persons in the delirium of fever having been cured by jumping into a cold bath; and there can be no doubt but that in some cases of Plague, cold bathing might be very advantageous. Vide Dr. Currie's "Medical Reports on the effects of Water in Febrile Diseases."

An extraordinary instance of the water mania in fever, and of an alleged cure from its being indulged, is thus related in a tract that was published in the Plague year:—"Thomas a Vega, a learned Physician, tells a story of one that was light-headed, and sick of a burning fever, and being in great heat, was extremely importunate that he might have leave to swim in that pool there (pointing with his hand to the floor of the chamber, which he fancied to be water), for, said he, If I should but swim there, I should be immediately well. At length the Physician being overcome with his entreaty, gave him leave; and presently with great content he gets out of the bed, and cheerfully rolls himself upon the floor, saying, The water was now as high as his knees, but he could wish it deeper; bye-and-bye he was more pleased that it was up to his middle, and withal he wished it a little higher, and presently after he seemed to be overjoyed, for that the water came up to his chin, and then he said 'He was very well;' and so he was, indeed, for he presently recovered."—A Brief Treatise of the Nature, Causes, &c. of the Pestilence, collected by W. Kemp, Master of Arts. London, 1665, p. 23.

On the other hand, the complaints and the murmurings were very bitter against the thing itself.

It would pierce the hearts of all that came by to hear the piteous cries of those infected people, who being thus out of their understandings by the violence of their pain, or the heat of their blood, were either shut in, or perhaps tied in their beds and chairs, to prevent their doing themselves hurt, and who would make a dreadful outcry at their being confined, and at their not being permitted to "die at large," as they called it, and as they would have done before.

This running of distempered people about the streets was very dismal, and the magistrates did their utmost to prevent it; but as it was generally in the night, and always sudden when such attempts were made, the officers could not be at hand to prevent it; and even when they got out in the day, the officers appointed did not care to meddle with them, because, as they were all grievously infected to be sure when they were come to that height, so they were more than ordinarily infectious, and it was one of the most dangerous things that could be to touch them. On the other hand, they generally ran on, not knowing what they did, till they dropped down stark dead, or till they had exhausted their spirits so as they would fall, and then die in perhaps half an hour or an hour; and what was most piteous to hear, they were sure to come to themselves entirely in that half hour or hour, and then to make most grievous and piercing cries and lamentations in the deep afflicting sense of the condition they were in. This was much of it before the order for shutting up of houses was strictly put in execution, for at first the watchmen were not so rigorous and severe as they were afterward, in the keeping the people in; that is to say, before they were, I mean some of them, severely punished for their neglect, failing in their duty, and letting people who were under their care slip away, or conniving at their going abroad, whether sick or well. But after they saw the officers appointed to examine into their conduct were resolved to have them do their duty, or be punished for the omission, they were more exact, and the people were strictly restrained; which was a thing they took so ill, and bore so impatiently, that their discontents can hardly be described: but there was an absolute necessity for it, that must be confessed, unless some other measures had been timely entered upon, and it was too late for that.

Had not this particular of the sick being restrained as above, been our case at that time, London would have been the most dreadful place that ever was in the world; there would, for aught I know, have as many people died in the streets as died in their houses; for when the distemper was at its height, it generally made them raving and delirious, and when they were so, they would never be persuaded to keep in their beds but by force; and many, who were not tied, threw themselves out of windows, when they found they could not get leave to go out of their doors.

It was for want of people conversing one with another, in this time of calamity, that it was impossible any particular person could come at the knowledge of all the extraordinary cases that occurred in different families; and particularly I believe it was never known to this day how many people in their deliriums drowned themselves in the Thames,* and in the river which runs from the marshes by Hackney, which we generally called Ware river, or Hackney river: as to those which were set down in the weekly bill, they were indeed few; nor could it be known of any of those, whether they drowned themselves by accident or not. But I believe, I might reckon up more, who, within the compass of my knowledge or observation, really drowned themselves in that year, than are put down in the bill of all put together, for many of the bodies were never found, who yet were known to be so lost: and the like, in other methods of self-destruction. There was also one man, in or about Whitecross-street, who burnt himself to death in his bed; some said it was done by himself, others that it was by the treachery of the nurse that attended him; but that he had the Plague upon him was agreed by all.

It was a merciful disposition of Providence also, and which I have many times thought of since that time, that no fires, or no considerable ones at least, happened in the city during that year, which, if it had been otherwise, would have been very dreadful; and either the people must have let them alone unquenched, or have come together in great crowds and throngs unconcerned at the danger of the infection, and not concerned at the houses they went into, at the goods they handled, or at the persons of the people they came among. But so it was, that excepting that in Cripplegate parish, and two or three little eruptions of fires, which were presently extinguished, there was no disaster of that kind happened in the whole year. They told us a story of a house in a place called Swan-alley, passing from Goswell-street near the end of Old-street into St. John-street, that a family was infected there, in so terrible a manner that every one of the house died; the last person lay dead on the floor, and as it is supposed, had laid herself all along to die just before the fire: the fire it seems had fallen from its place, being of wood, and had taken hold of the boards and the joists they lay on, and burnt as far as just to the body, but had not taken hold of the dead body, though she had little more than her shift on, and had gone out of itself, not hurting the rest of the house, though it was a slight timber house. How true this might be, I do not determine; but the city being to suffer severely the next year by fire, this year it felt very little of that calamity.

Indeed, considering the deliriums which the agony threw people into, and how, I have mentioned, in their madness, when they were alone, they did many desperate things; it was very strange there were no more disasters of that kind.

It has been frequently asked me, and I cannot say that I ever knew how to give a direct answer to it, "How it came to pass that so many infected people appeared abroad in the streets, at the same time that the houses which were infected were so vigilantly searched, and all of them shut up and guarded as they were?"

I confess I know not what answer to give to this, unless it be this, that in so great and populous a city as this is, it was impossible to discover every house that was infected as soon as it was so, or to shut up all the houses that were infected: so that the people had the liberty of going about the streets, even where they pleased, unless they were known to belong to such and such infected houses.

It is true, that as several physicians told my Lord Mayor, the fury of the contagion was such at some particular times, and people sickened so fast, and died so soon, that it was impossible, and indeed to no purpose, to go about to inquire who was sick and who was well, or to shut them up with such exactness as the thing required; almost every house in a whole street being infected, and in many places every person in some of the houses; and that which was still worse, by the time that the houses were known to be infected, most of the persons infected would be stone dead, and the rest run away for fear of being shut up; so that it was to very small purpose to call them infected houses and shut them up; the infection having ravaged and taken its leave of the house, before it was really known that the family was any way touched.

This might be sufficient to convince any reasonable person, that it was not in the power of the magistrates, or of any human methods or policy, to prevent the spreading of the infection; so that this way of shutting up of houses was perfectly insufficient for that end. Indeed, it seemed to have no manner of public good in it, equal or proportionable to the grievous burthen that it was to the particular families that were so shut up; and as far as I was employed by the public in directing that severity, I frequently found occasion to see that it was incapable of answering the end. For example, as I was desired as a visitor, or examiner, to inquire into the particulars of several families which were infected, we scarce came to any house where the Plague had visibly appeared in the family, but that some of the family were fled and gone; the magistrates would resent this, and charge the examiners with being remiss in their examination or inspection, as by that means houses were long infected before it was known. Now, as I was in this dangerous office but half the appointed time, which was two months, it was long enough to inform myself, that we were no way capable of coming at the knowledge of the true state of any family, but by inquiring at the door, or of the neighbours. As for going to every house to search, that was a part no authority would offer to impose on the inhabitants, or any citizen would undertake, for it would have been exposing us to certain infection and death, and to the ruin of our own families as well as of ourselves; nor would any citizen of probity, and that could be depended upon, have staid in the town, if they had been made liable to such a severity.

Seeing then that we could come at the certainty of things by no method but that of inquiry of the neighbours, or of the family,—and on that we could not justly depend,—it was not possible but that the uncertainty of this matter would remain as above.

It is true, masters of families were bound by the order, to give notice to the examiner of the place wherein he lived, within two hours after he should discover it, of any person being sick in his house, that is to say, having signs of the infection; but they found so many ways to evade this, and excuse their negligence, that they seldom gave that notice, till they had taken measures to have every one escape out of the house, who had a mind to escape, whether they were sick or sound; and while this was so, it is easy to see, that the shutting up of houses was no way to be depended upon, as a sufficient method for putting a stop to the infection; because, as I have said elsewhere, many of those that so went out of those infected houses had the Plague really upon them, though they might really think themselves sound: and some of these were the people that walked the streets till they fell down dead,—not that they were suddenly struck with the distemper, as with a bullet that killed with the stroke, but that they really had the infection in their blood long before; only, that as it preyed secretly on the vitals, it appeared not till it seized the heart with a mortal power, and the patient died in a moment, as with a sudden fainting, or an apoplectic fit.*

I know that some, even of our physicians, thought, for a time, that those people that so died in the streets were seized but that moment they fell, as if they had been touched by a stroke from Heaven, as men are killed by a flash of lightning; but they found reason to alter their opinion afterward; for upon examining the bodies of such, after they were dead, they always either had tokens upon them, or other evident proofs of the distemper having been longer upon them than they had otherwise expected.

This often was the reason that, as I have said, we that were examiners were not able to come at the knowledge of the infection being entered into a house till it was too late to shut it up; and sometimes not till the people that were left were all dead. In Petticoat-lane two houses together were infected, and several people sick; but the distemper was so well concealed, that the examiner, who was my neighbour, got no knowledge of it till notice was sent him that the people were all dead, and that the carts should call there to fetch them away. The two heads of the families concerted their measures, and so ordered their matters, as that when the examiner was in the neighbourhood, they appeared generally at a time, and answered, that is, lied for one another; or got some of the neighbourhood to say they were all in health, and, perhaps, knew no better, till death making it impossible to keep it any longer as a secret, the dead-carts were called in the night to both the houses, and so it became public; but when the examiner ordered the constable to shut up the houses, there was nobody left in them but three people, two in one house, and one in the other, just dying, and a nurse in each house, who acknowledged that they had buried five before, that the houses had been infected nine or ten days, and that for all the rest of the two families, which were many, they were gone, some sick, some well, or whether sick or well, could not be known.

In like manner, at another house in the same lane, a man, having his family infected, but very unwilling to be shut up, when he could conceal it no longer, shut up himself; that is to say, he set the great Red Cross upon his door, with the words—"LORD HAVE MERCY UPON US," and so deluded the examiner, who supposed it had been done by the constable by order of the other examiner, for there were two examiners to every district or precinct: by this means he had free egress and regress into his house again, and out of it, as he pleased, notwithstanding it was infected; till at length his stratagem was found out, and then he, with the sound part of his servants and family, made off and escaped; so they were not shut up at all.

These things made it very hard, if not impossible, as I have said, to prevent the spreading of an infection by the shutting up of houses, unless the people would think the shutting up of their houses no grievance, and be so willing to have it done as that they would give notice duly and faithfully to the magistrates of their being infected as soon as it was known by themselves; but as that cannot be expected from them, and as the examiners cannot be supposed, as above, to go into their houses to visit and search, all the good of shutting up houses will be defeated, and few houses will be shut up in time, except those of the poor who cannot conceal it, and of some people who will be discovered by the terror and consternation which the thing puts them into.

I got myself discharged of the dangerous office I was in as soon as I could get another admitted, whom I had obtained for a little money to accept of it; and so, instead of serving the two months, which was directed, I was not above three weeks in it, and a great while too, considering it was in the month of August, at which time the distemper began to rage with great violence at our end of the town.

In the execution of this office I could not refrain speaking my opinion among my neighbours as to this shutting up the people in their houses; in which we saw most evidently the severities that were used, though grievous in themselves, had also this particular objection against them, namely, that they did not answer the end, as I have said, but that the distempered people went, day by day, about the streets; and it was our united opinion, that a method to have removed the sound from the sick, in case of a particular house being visited, would have been much more reasonable, on many accounts, leaving nobody with the sick persons but such as should, on such occasion, request to stay and declare themselves content to be shut up with them.

Our scheme for removing those that were sound from those that were sick, was only in such houses as were infected, and confining the sick was no confinement; those that could not stir would not complain while they were in their senses, and while they had the power of judging: indeed, when they came to be delirious and light-headed, then they would cry out of the cruelty of being confined;—but for the removal of those that were well, we thought it highly reasonable and just, for their own sakes, they should be removed from the sick; and that, for other people's safety, they should keep retired for a while, to see that they were sound, and might not infect others; and we thought twenty or thirty days enough for this.

Now, certainly, if houses had been provided on purpose for those that were sound to perform this demi-quarantine in, they would have much less reason to think themselves injured in such a restraint than in being confined with infected people in the houses where they lived.

It is here, however, to be observed, that after the funerals became so many that people could not toll the bell, mourn, or weep, or wear black for one another, as they did before; no, nor so much as make coffins for those that died; so after a while the fury of the infection appeared to be so increased, that in short, they shut up no houses at all.* It seemed enough that all the remedies of that kind had been used till they were found fruitless, and that the plague spread itself with an irre-

* This is corroborated by an entry in Pepys' "Diary," under the date of September the 14th. After stating that he went upon 'Change, which he wondered to see so full, "about 200 people, but plain men all," he proceeds thus:—"And Lord! to see how I did endeavour all I could to talk with as few as I could, there being now no observation of shutting up of houses infected, that to be sure we do converse and meet with people that have the Plague upon them."

sistible fury; so that, as the fire, the succeeding year, spread itself, and burnt with such violence that the citizens, in despair, gave over their endeavours to extinguish it, so in the plague, it came at last to such violence that the people sat still, looking at one another, and seemed quite abandoned to despair. Whole streets seemed to be desolated, and not to be shut up only, but to be emptied of their inhabitants; doors were left open, and windows stood shattering with the wind in empty houses for want of people to shut them. In a word, people began to give up themselves to their fears, and to think that all regulations and methods were in vain, and that there was nothing to be hoped for, but an universal desolation: and it was even in the height of this general despair, that it pleased God to stay his hand, and to slacken the fury of the contagion, in such a manner, as was even surprising, (like its beginning,) and demonstrated it to be his own particular hand, and that above, if not without, the agency of means, as I shall take notice of in its proper place.

But I must still speak of the Plague, as in its height, raging even to desolation, and the people under the most dreadful consternation, even, as I have said, to despair. It is hardly credible to what excesses the passions of men carried them in this extremity of the distemper; and this part, I think, was as moving as the rest. What could affect a man in his full power of reflection; and what could make deeper impressions on the soul, than to see a man, almost naked, and got out of his house, or perhaps out of his bed into the street, come out of Harrow-alley, (a populous conjunction or collection of alleys, courts, and passages in the Butcher-row, in White-chapel)—I say, what could be more affecting, than to see this poor man come out into the open street, run dancing and singing, and making a thousand antic gestures, with five or six women and children running after him, crying and calling upon him, for the Lord's sake, to come back, and entreating the help of others to bring him back?—but all in vain, nobody daring to lay a hand upon him, or to come near him!

This was a most grievous and afflicting thing to me, who saw it all from my own windows; for all this while the poor afflicted man was, as I observed it, even then in the utmost agony of pain, having, as they said, two swellings upon him, which could not be brought to break, or to suppurate; but by laying strong caustics on them, the surgeons had, it seems, hopes to break them, which caustics were then upon him, burning his flesh as with a hot iron. I cannot say what became of this poor man, but I think he continued roving about in that manner till he fell down and died.

No wonder the aspect of the city itself was frightful, the usual concourse of people in the streets, and which used to be supplied from our end of the town, was abated; the Exchange was not kept shut indeed, but it was no more frequented,* the fires were lost, they had been almost extinguished for some days, by a very smart and hasty rain: but that was not all, some of the physicians insisted, that they were not only no benefit, but injurious to the health of people. This they made a great clamour about, and complained to the Lord Mayor about it. On the other hand, others of the same faculty, and eminent too, opposed them, and gave their reasons why the fires were and must be useful to assuage the violence of the distemper. I cannot give a full account of their arguments on both sides; only this I remember, that they cavilled very much with one another: some were for fires, but that they must be made of wood, and not coal, and of particular sorts of wood too, such as fir in particular, or cedar, because of the strong effluvia of turpentine; others were for coal and not wood, because of the sulphur and bitumen; and others were for neither one nor other.* Upon the whole, the Lord Mayor ordered no more fires, and especially on this account, namely, that the plague was so fierce that they saw

*For the Lord Mayor's Proclamation, ordering the fires, see Appendix, No. IV.—There cannot be a doubt but that the pestilence derived strength from this ill-advised mode of attempting its suppression. The following passage relating to the subject, occurs in Dr. Hodges's "Loimologia," pp. 24, 25:—

"In the beginning of September, such was the violence of the disease, that more than twelve thousand were carried off weekly. At length the presiding Magistrates, (the Court having removed to Oxford,) in this terrible time, that nothing might be left untried, urged by the extreme peril, determined on lighting fires in all the streets, for three days together. When this was in agitation, we, the Physicians, opposed it with all our authority; alleging that the air itself remained uninfected, and that the scheme therefore would be alike useless and expensive. But the Magistrates, over anxious for the health of the City, and preferring the authority and example of our celebrated Hippocrates, notwithstanding our expostulations, caused fires everywhere to be lighted. Alas! the dispute that had arisen was superseded by the event: the three days had scarcely elapsed, when the mourning Heavens, as if weeping for the innumerable funerals, or rather bewailing the noxious errors that had been committed, extinguished the flames by profuse showers. I leave it to others to decide whether these fires were to be regarded as ominous preludes of the future conflagration, or of the burning funeral piles; but whether through the suffocative effluvia of the coals, or of the dampness of the rainy atmosphere immediately following, that night brought unheard-of destruction: for truly more than four thousand perished before the morning. Henceforth may those in authority act more cautiously, and from our misfortune posterity take warning; and not attempt cures after the manner of quacks by following mistaken analogies."

evidently it defied all means, and rather seemed to increase than decrease, upon any application to check and abate it; and yet this amazement of the magistrates proceeded rather from want of being able to apply any means successfully, than from any unwillingness, either to expose themselves, or undertake the care and weight of business; for, to do them justice, they neither spared their pains nor their persons;—but nothing answered; the infection raged, and the people were now frightened and terrified to the last degree, so that, as I may say, they gave themselves up, and, as I mentioned above, abandoned themselves to their despair.*

But let me observe here, that when I say the people abandoned themselves to despair, I do not mean to what men call a religious despair, or a despair of their eternal state, but I mean a despair of their being able to escape the infection, or to outlive the Plague, which they saw was so raging and so irresistible in its force, that indeed few people that were touched with it in its height, about August und September, escaped; and, which is very particular, contrary to its ordinary operation in June and July, and the beginning of August, when, as I have observed, many were infected, and continued so many days, and then went off, after having had the poison in their blood a long time; but now, on the contrary, most of the people who were taken during the last two weeks in August, and in the first three weeks in September, generally died in two or three days at farthest, and many the very same day they were taken. Whether the dog-days, or as our astrologers pretended to express themselves the influence of the dog-star, had that malignant effect; or that all those who had the seeds of infection before in them, brought it up to a maturity at that time altogether, I know not; but this was the time when it was reported that above 3000 people died in one night,* and they that would have us believe they more critically observed it, pretend to say that they all died within the space of two hours, viz., between the hours of one and three in the morning.

* Under the date of September 6th, Pepys says:—"To London, and there I saw fires burning in the streets, through the whole City, by the Lord Mayor's order. Thence by water to the Duke of Albemarle's (at Whitehall): all the way fires on each side of the Thames; and strange to see in broad daylight, two or three burials upon the Bank-side, one at the very heels of another: doubtless all of the Plague; and yet at least forty or fifty people going along with every one of them."—Diary, vol. ii.

As to the suddenness of people's dying at this time more than before, there were innumerable instances of it, and I could name several in my neighbourhood: one family without the Bars, and not far from me, were all seemingly well on the Monday, being ten in family; that evening one maid and one apprentice were taken ill and died the next morning, when the other apprentice and two children were touched, whereof one died the same evening, and the other two on Wednesday. In a word, by Saturday at noon, the master, mistress, four children, and four servants, were all gone, and the house left entirely empty, except an ancient woman, who came in to take charge of the goods for the master of the family's brother, who lived not far off, and who had not been sick.

Many houses were then left desolate, all the people being carried away dead, and especially in an alley farther on the same side, beyond the Bars, going in at the sign of Moses and Aaron; there were several houses together, which (they said) had not one person left alive in them, and some that died last in several of those houses, were left a little too long before they were fetched out to be buried; the reason of which was not, as some have written very untruly, that the living were not sufficient to bury the dead, but that the mortality was so great in the yard or alley, that there was nobody left to give notice to the buriers or sextons, that there were any dead bodies there to be buried. It was said, how true I know not, that some of those bodies were so much corrupted, and so rotten, that it was with difficulty they were carried; and as the carts could not come any nearer than to the alley-gate in the High-street, it was so much the more difficult to bring them along; but I am not certain how many bodies were then left. I am sure that ordinarily it was not so.

As I have mentioned how the people were brought into a condition to despair of life, and abandon themselves, so this very thing had a strange effect among us for three or four weeks; that is, it made them bold and venturous: they were no more shy of one another, nor restrained within doors, but went anywhere and everywhere, and began to converse; one would say to another,—“I do not ask you how you are, or say how I am; it is certain we shall all go, so 'tis no matter who is sick or who is sound;” and so they ran desperately into any place or any company.

As it brought the people into public company so it was surprising how it brought them to crowd into the churches: they inquired no more into who they sat near to, or far from what offensive smells they met with, or what condition the people seemed to be in, but looking upon themselves all as so many dead corpses, they came to the churches without the least caution, and crowded together as if their lives were of no consequence, compared to the work which they came about there. Indeed, the zeal which they showed in coming, and the earnestness and affection they showed in their attention to what they heard, made it manifest what a value people would all put upon the worship of God, if they thought every day they attended at the church, that that day would be their last!

Nor was it without other strange effects, for it took away all manner of prejudice at, or scruple about, the person whom they found in the pulpit when they came to the churches. It cannot be doubted but that many of the ministers of the parish churches were cut off among others, in so common and dreadful a calamity; and others had not courage enough to stand it, but removed into the country, as they found means for escape: as then some parish churches were quite vacant and forsaken, the people made no scruple of desiring such Dissenters as had been a few years before deprived of their livings, by virtue of the Act of Parliament called the Act of Uniformity, to preach in the churches: nor did the church ministers in that case make any difficulty of accepting their assistance; so that many of those whom they called silenced ministers, had their mouths opened on this occasion, and preached publicly to the people.

Here we may observe, and I hope it will not be amiss to take notice of it, that a near view of death would soon reconcile men of good principles one to another; and that it is chiefly owing to our easy situation in life, and our putting these things far from us, that our breaches are fomented, ill blood continued, prejudices and breach of charity and of Christian union so kept, so far carried on among us as it is. Another Plague year would reconcile all these differences; a close conversing with death, or with diseases that threaten death, would scum off the gall from our tempers, remove the animosities among us, and bring us to see with differing eyes than those which we look on things with before. As the people who had been used to join with the Church were reconciled at this time with the admitting the Dissenters to preach to them, so the Dissenters, who, with an uncommon prejudice, had broken off from the communion of the Church of England, were now content to come to the parish churches, and to conform to the worship which they did not approve of before; but, as the terror of the infection abated, those things all returned again to their less desirable channel, and to the course they were in before.*

* The Act of Uniformity was only one of the several measures contrived or promoted by the Episcopalians to effect the complete restoration of the Church establishment as settled in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. They were opposed by sectaries of various classes, among whom the Presbyterians were the most formidable, and probably the most numerous; and against them especially was this hostile statute directed. "Both the Presbyterians and the Cavaliers had given proofs of their attachment to the king; but their loyalty was of a different order: the first sought to limit, the latter to extend, the powers of the crown; the one looked on the constitution of the church as hostile, the other as favourable to their respective views." † Hence a conflict between these two parties became almost unavoidable; and the devoted royalists, (at the head of whom may be reckoned the Chancellor Hyde, afterwards Lord Clarendon,) perceived it to be their interest to crush, if possible, the Presbyterian faction; and they therefore employed their whole weight and influence in aiding those who were determined to make conformity to the episcopal church a part of the law of the land.

Those bishops who were living at the time of the king's restoration were reinstated in their sees as a matter of course, and new bishops were appointed to the vacant dioceses. On the 30th of July, 1661, an act of Parliament received the royal assent to repeal the law made in the 17th of Charles I. for the exclusion of the bishops from the House of Peers. This must have greatly diminished the parliamentary strength of the Presbyterians;—whose power and interest throughout the country were still further weakened by the Corporation Act, passed on the 20th of December following. By that act, "Commissioners were appointed with the power of removing at discretion every individual holding office in or under any corporation, in the kingdom; and it required that all persons permitted to retain their situations should qualify themselves by

I mention this but historically; I have no mind to enter into arguments to move either, or both sides, to a more charitable compliance one with another; I do not see that it is probable such a discourse would be either suitable or renouncing the Solemn League and Covenant, by taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and by declaring, upon oath, their belief of the unlawfulness of taking up arms against the king on any pretence whatsoever." With respect to the admission of future officers, the Act moreover provided, that no man should be eligible who had not, within the year preceding his election, "taken the Sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England."

The next step taken by the Cavaliers and High-Churchmen was to procure a law which should reduce the whole body of the clergy under the authority of the bishops. This was effected by the Act of Uniformity, by which every minister was required, under the penalty of forfeiting all his ecclesiastical preferments, to conform to the ritual prescribed in the book of Common Prayer, before August 24, 1662, which being the feast of St. Bartholomew, this statute was styled the Bartholomew Act. All ministers were likewise required to sign the following declaration: "I do hereby declare my unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything contained and prescribed in and by the Book intituled the Book of Common Prayer," &c. Besides this, every person was obliged to sign a declaration contained in the Militia Act, promising to conform to the Liturgy of the Church of England, and to renounce the Solemn League and Covenant, which had been imposed on all who held ecclesiastical or other offices, during the ascendancy of the Presbyterians. Among the provisions of this Act, it was stated, that "no person shall be capable of any benefice, or presume to consecrate or administer the holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, before he be ordained Priest by Episcopal Ordination, upon pain to forfeit for every offence the sum of one hundred pounds."

The patrons of this measure, anxious chiefly to deprive the Presbyterian clergy of their influence over the people, made no scruple however of sacrificing, in the general proscription, all who presumed to dissent from the Church of England, whether Catholics or Protestants. The King would willingly have favoured the Catholics; and as he could not directly procure for them an exemption from the penalties of such provisions of the act as affected them, he endeavoured to secure to himself the means of relieving them, by retaining a discretionary power of dispensing with the execution of the law in particular cases. In this attempt for the present he was unsuccessful. It was on the 18th of February that the Act received the royal signature; and in the period that intervened before St. Bartholomew's day, the leaders of the Presbyterian party made every effort to prevent the rigid enforcement of the law. Having free access to his Majesty, they complained that he had violated his promise made to them in the declaration from Breda, in which he had said "that no man should be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion in matters of religion, which did not disturb the peace of the kingdom;" and that he would "consent to such an act of Parliament, as upon mature deliberation should be successful: the breaches seem rather to widen, and tend to a widening farther, than to closing; and who am I that I should think myself able to influence either one side or other? But this I may repeat again, that it is evident offered to him for the granting full indulgence to tender consciences." The remonstrances of the Presbyterians and their friends, according to Clarendon, had so much influence on the King that he was induced to promise that he would issue a proclamation, or give orders to the Bishops to suspend the full operation of the act for three months beyond the time appointed; so that those ministers who conformed so far as merely to read the Liturgy might not be subjected to the forfeiture of their benefices. But, on consultation with the heads of the church and the great law officers, he found himself compelled to submit to their representations, and the law was suffered to take its course.

"The fatal St. Bartholomew," says Hume, "approached; the day when the clergy were obliged by the late law either to relinquish their livings, or to sign the articles required of them. A combination had been entered into by the most zealous of the Presbyterian ecclesiastics to refuse the subscription, in hopes that the Bishops would not venture at once to expel so great a number of the most popular preachers. The Catholic party at Court, who desired a great rent among the Protestants, encouraged them in this obstinacy, and gave them hopes that the king would protect them in their refusal. The king himself, by his irresolute conduct, contributed, either from design or accident, to increase this opinion. Above all, the terms of subscription had been made strict and rigid, on purpose to disgust all the zealous and scrupulous among the Presbyterians, and deprive them of their livings; and in consequence about two thousand of the clergy, in one day, relinquished their cures; and to the astonishment of the court, sacrificed their interest to their religious tenets."—"During the dominion of the Parliamentary party, a fifth of each living had been left to the ejected clergymen; but this indulgence, though at first insisted on by the House of Peers, was now refused to the Presbyterians. However difficult to conciliate peace among theologians, it was hoped by many that some relaxation in the terms of communion might have kept the Presbyterians united to the church, and have cured those ecclesiastical factions which had been so fatal, and were still so dangerous. Bishopies were offered to Calamy, Baxter, and Reynolds, leaders among the Presbyterians: the last only could be prevailed on to accept. Deaneries and other preferments were refused by many."*

The conduct of the churchmen in this affair may be partly excused on the score of retaliation, for the sufferings which they had themselves endured during the Protectorate; but the behaviour of the courtiers admits of no such apology. A recent historian severely remarks, that "the Act of Uniformity may have been necessary for the restoration of the church to its former discipline and doctrine; but if such was the intention of those who formed the declaration from Breda, they were guilty of infidelity to the king, and of fraud to the people, by putting into his mouth language, which, with the aid of equivocadeath will reconcile us all; on the other side the grave we shall be all brethren again. In heaven, whither I hope we may come from all parties and persuasions, we shall find neither prejudice nor scruple: there we shall be of one principle and of one opinion. Why we cannot be content to go hand in hand to the place where we shall join heart and hand without the least hesitation, and with the most complete harmony and affection—I say, why we cannot do so here—I can say nothing to; neither shall I say anything more of it, but that it remains to be lamented.

I could dwell a great while upon the calamities of this dreadful time, and go on to describe the objects that appeared among us every day, the dreadful extravagances which the distraction of sick people drove them into; how the streets began now to be fuller of frightful objects, and families to be made even a terror to themselves. But after I have told you, as I have above, that one man being tied in his bed, and finding no other way to deliver himself, set the bed on fire with his candle, which unhappily stood within his reach, and burnt himself in his bed; and how another, by the insufferable torment he bore, danced and sung naked in the streets, not knowing one ecstasy from another; I say, after I have mentioned these things, what can be added more? What can be said to represent the misery of these times, more lively to the reader, or to give him a more perfect idea of a complicated distress?

tion, they might explain away; and by raising in them expectations which it was never meant to fulfil.”*

It might have been expected that the Episcopalians, having recovered their benefices and completely restored the ecclesiastical establishment, would have been satisfied with the success of their projects; but, animated by the spirit of proselytism, if not by yet more worthy motives, they continued throughout the reign of Charles II. to harass their fallen enemies with a series of penal enactments, which, though somewhat modified by the policy of the courtiers, in order to gratify the King's predilection for the Catholics, had the inevitable effect of such measures, in confirming and perpetuating those sectarian principles which they were ostensibly intended to eradicate.

I must acknowledge that this time was terrible, that I was sometimes at the end of all my resolutions, and that I had not the courage that I had at the beginning. As the extremity brought other people abroad, it drove me home, and except having made my voyage down to Blackwall and Greenwich, as I have related, which was an excursion, I kept afterwards very much within doors, as I had for about a fortnight before. I have said already, that I repented several times that I had ventured to stay in town, and had not gone away with my brother and his family, but it was too late for that now; and after I had retreated, and stayed within doors a good while before my impatience led me abroad, then they called me, as I have said, to an ugly and dangerous office, which brought me out again; but as that was expired, while the height of the distemper lasted, I retired again, and continued close ten or twelve days more; during which time many dismal spectacles represented themselves in my view, out of my own windows, and in our own street, as that particularly from Harrow-alley, of the poor outrageous creature which danced and sung in his agony,—and many others there were. Scarce a day or night passed over, but some dismal thing or other happened at the end of that Harrow-alley, which was a place full of poor people most of them belonging to the butchers, or to employments depending upon the butchery.”*

* In the “Intelligencer” of August the 11th, No. 63, is this passage:—“In the city, that is, in the close and filthy alleys and corners about it, the plague is very much increased, but in the broad and open streets there is but little appearance of it. The last bill reckons 2817 of the plague, whereof 208 within the walls of the city.”

Sometimes heaps and throngs of people would burst out of the alley, most of them women making a dreadful clamour, mixed or compounded of screeches, cryings, and calling one another, that we could not conceive what to make of it. Almost all the dead part of the night the dead-cart stood at the end of that alley, for if it went in it could not well turn again, and could go in but a little way. There, I say, it stood to receive dead bodies, and as the church-yard was but a little way off, if it went away full it would soon be back again. It is impossible to describe the most horrible cries and noise the poor people would make at their bringing the dead bodies of their children and friends out to the cart, and by the number one would have thought there had been none left behind, or that there were people enough for a small city living in those places. Several times they cried murder, sometimes fire; but it was easy to perceive it was all distraction, and the complaints of distressed and dis-tempered people.

I believe it was everywhere thus at that time, for the Plague raged six or seven weeks beyond all that I have expressed; and came even to such a height, that in the extremity, they began to break into that excellent order of which I have spoken so much, in behalf of the magistrates, namely, that no dead bodies were seen in the streets, or burials in the day-time, for there was a necessity, in this extremity, to bear with its being otherwise for a little while.*

* Evelyn, under the date of September the 7th, writes thus:—"I went all along the City and Suburbs from Kent street to St. James's, a dismal passage, and dangerous to see so many coffins exposed in the streets, now thin of people; the shops shut up, and all in mournful silence, as not knowing whose turn it might be next:—there perishing nearly 10,000 poor creatures weekly. I went to ye Duke of Albe-marle for a Pest-ship, to wait on our infected men, who were not a few."

One thing I cannot omit here, and indeed I thought it was extraordinary; at least it seemed a remarkable hand of Divine justice, viz., that all the predictors, astrologers, fortune-tellers, and what they called cunning men, conjurers, and the like; calculators of nativities, and dreamers of dreams, and such people were gone and vanished, not one of them was to be found. I am verily persuaded that a great number of them fell in the heat of the calamity, having ventured to stay upon the prospect of getting great estates; and indeed their gain was but too great for a time, through the madness and folly of the people; but now they were silent, many of them went to their long home, not able to foretell their own fate, nor to calculate their own nativities. Some have been critical enough to say that every one of them died: I dare not affirm that; but this I must own, that I never heard of one of them that ever appeared after the calamity was over.

But to return to my particular observations, during this dreadful part of the visitation. I am now come as I have said, to the month of September, which was the most dreadful of its kind, I believe, that London ever saw; for by all the accounts which I have seen of the preceding visitations which have been in London, nothing has been like it; the number in the weekly bills amounting to almost 40,000 from the 22nd of August to the 26th of September, being but five weeks. The particulars of the bills were as follow, viz. :—

Mr. Evelyn was one of the commissioners appointed for the care of the sick and wounded prisoners in the Dutch war; and it was with the utmost difficulty that himself and his coadjutors could obtain sufficient supplies from the government to keep the unfortunate beings committed to their charge from actual starvation. He concludes his "Diary" for the year 1665, with the following expression of his thankfulness:—"Now blessed be God for His extraordinary mercies and preservation of me this year, when thousands and ten thousands perish'd and were swept away on each side of me."

* The following very vivid but fearful description of the ravages of the Plague in August and September, is given by the Rev. Thos. Vincent, in his curious tract (before quoted) intituled, "God's Terrible Voice in the City." Mr. Vincent, to use his own words, "was here in the city, from the beginning to the end" of the pestilence, (sect. v. p. 28,) and as he professedly drew up his narrative to keep the "Memory of the Judgment" alive, both in himself and others, and was a witness of many of its most appalling occurrences, we may rely with confidence on the general fidelity of his relations. After detailing the advancing cause and effects of the Plague from May to July, he proceeds thus:—(vide Sect. v. pp. 36—39.) "In August, how dreadful is the increase?—Now the cloud is very black, and the storm comes down upon us very sharp. Now death rides triumphantly on his pale horse through our streets, and breaks into every house almost where any inhabitants are to be found. Now people fall as thick as the leaves in autumn, when they are shaken by a mighty wind. Now there is a dismal solitude in London streets; every day looks with the face of a Sabbath-day, observed with greater solemnity than it used to be in the city. Now shops are shut in, people rare and very few that walk about, inasmuch that the grass begins to spring up in some places, and a deep silence almost in every place, especially within the walls. No prancing horses, no rattling coaches, no calling in customers, nor offering wares: no London Cries sounding in the ears. If any voice be heard it is the groans of dying persons, breathing forth their last, and the funeral knells of them that are ready to be carried to their graves. Now shutting up of visited houses (there being so many) is at an end, and most of the well are mingled among the sick, which otherwise would have got no help. Now in some places, where the people did generally stay, not one house in an hundred but what is infected; and in many houses half the family is swept away; in some the whole, from the eldest to the youngest: few escape but with the death of one or two. Never did so many husbands and wives die together: never did so many parents carry their children with them to the grave, and go together into the same house under earth, who had lived together in the same house upon it. Now the nights are too short to bury the dead: the whole day, though at so great a length, is hardly sufficient to light the dead that fall thereon into their graves. We could hardly go forth, but we should meet many coffins, and see many with sores, and limping in the streets."

Speaking of the month of September, Mr. Vincent says:—"Of the 130 parishes in and about the city, there were but four parishes which were not infected; and in those, few people remaining that were not gone into the country:—

"Now the grave doth open its mouth without measure. Multitudes! multitudes in the valley of the shadow of death, thronging daily into eternity. The church-yards now are stufft so full with dead corpses,

This was a prodigious number of itself, but if I should add the reasons which I have to believe that this account was deficient, and how deficient it was, you would, with me, make no scruple to believe that there died above ten thousand a-week for all those weeks, one week with another, and a proportion for several weeks both before and after. The confusion among the people, especially within the city, at that time, was inexpressible; the terror was so great at last, that the courage of the people appointed to carry away the dead began to fail them; nay, several of them died although they had had the distemper before and were recovered; and some of them dropped down when they have been carrying the bodies, even at the pit-side, and just ready to throw them in. And this confusion was greater in the city, because they had flattered themselves with hopes of escaping; and thought the bitterness of death was past. One cart, they told us, going up Shoreditch, was forsaken of the drivers, or being left to one man to drive, he died in the street, and the horses going on, overthrew the cart, and left the bodies, some thrown out here, some there, in a dismal manner. Another cart was, it seems, found in the great pit in Finsbury fields, the driver being dead, or having gone and abandoned it, and the horses running too near the pit, the cart fell in and drew the horses in also. It was suggested that the driver was thrown in with it, and that the cart fell upon him, by reason his whip was seen to be in the pit among the bodies; but that, I suppose, could not be certain.

that they are in many places swelled two or three feet higher than they were before; and new ground is broken up to bury the dead."—He goes on to say:—"Now hell from beneath is moved at the number of guests that are received into its chambers," &c.—But, as this is the most exceptionable part of his work, and as his authority as an eye-witness is no longer to be received, our extracts will here terminate.

In our parish of Aldgate, the dead-carts were several times, as I have heard, found standing at the church-yard gate, full of dead bodies, but neither bellman nor driver, or any one else with it. Neither in these, nor many other cases, did they know what bodies they had in their cart, for sometimes they were let down with ropes out of balconies and out of windows; and sometimes the bearers brought them to the cart, sometimes other people; nor as the men themselves said, did they trouble themselves to keep any account of the numbers.

The vigilance of the magistrates was now put to the utmost trial, and it must be confessed, can never be enough acknowledged on this occasion also, namely, that whatever expense or trouble they were at, two things were never neglected in the city or suburbs either:—

First.—Provisions were always to be had in full plenty, and the price not much raised, neither hardly worth speaking of.

Second.—No dead bodies lay unburied or uncovered; and if one walked from one end of the city to another, no funeral, nor sign of it, was to be seen in the day-time, except a little, as I have said above, in the first three weeks in September.

This last article perhaps will hardly be believed, when some accounts which others have published since that shall be seen, wherein they say that the dead lay unburied,—which I am assured was utterly false. At least, if it had been anywhere so, it must have been in houses where the living were gone from the dead, having found means, as I have observed, to escape, and where no notice was given to the officers; all which amounts to nothing at all in the case in hand: for this I am positive in, having myself been employed a little in the direction of that part of the parish in which I lived, and where as great a desolation was made in proportion to the number of inhabitants as was anywhere; I say I am sure that no dead bodies remained unburied there: that is to say, none that the proper officers knew of; none for want of people to carry them off, and buriers to put them into the ground and cover them; and this is sufficient to the argument; for what might lie in houses and holes, as in Moses and Aaron Alley, is nothing; for it is most certain, they were buried as soon as they were found. As to the first article, namely, of provisions, the scarcity or dearness, though I have mentioned it before, and shall speak of it again, yet I must observe here—

First.—The price of bread in particular was not much raised; * for in the beginning of the year, viz., in the first week in March, the penny wheaten loaf was ten ounces and a half; and in the height of the contagion it was to be had at nine ounces and a half, and never dearer, no, not all that season; and about the beginning of November it was sold ten ounces and a half again; the like of which, I believe, was never heard of in any city under so dreadful a visitation before.

Secondly.—Neither was there (which I wondered much at) any want of bakers or ovens kept open to supply the people with bread; but this was indeed alleged by some families, viz., that their maid-servants going to the bake-houses with their dough to be baked, which was then the

* There was very little variation in the price of bread during the whole year. At its commencement the penny wheaten loaf was ordered by the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen to contain eleven ounces. For several weeks in January and February eleven ounces and a half were sold for the penny; but the weight was afterwards decreased to ten ounces and a half, ten ounces, and nine ounces and a half; which was the lowest weight during the summer and autumn. In the last six weeks of the year the penny loaf contained ten ounces and a half.—

custom, sometimes came home with the sickness, that is to say, the Plague upon them.

In all this dreadful visitation there were, as I have said before, but two pest-houses made use of, viz., one in the fields beyond Old-street, and one in Westminster,* neither was there any compulsion used in carrying people thither. Indeed there was no need of compulsion in the case, for there were thousands of poor distressed people, who, having no help or conveniences, or supplies but of charity, would have been very glad to have been carried thither, and been taken care of, which indeed was the only thing that, I think, was wanting in the whole public management of the city; seeing nobody was here allowed to be brought to the pest-house but where money was given, or security for money, either at their introducing, or upon their being cured and sent out,—for very many were sent out again whole, and very good physicians were appointed to those places, so that many people did very well there, of which I shall make mention again. The * De Foe may be right as to there having been only two principal pest-houses, but there certainly were other temporary ones in different parts of London. Parton, a late vestry clerk of St. Giles's, says, in his "History" of that parish, that a "structure denominated the Pest-house" was erected therein during the great Plague of 1665; and that "it was afterwards pulled down, and the materials sold." From the small sum it produced, he supposes it to have been of timber. In his account of disbursements one item is as follows:—

"Paid for oates and beanes for the horse at the Pest-house ... .. £7 9 6."

The horse here mentioned, says Mr. Parton (p. 266), was probably used to draw the parish dead-cart. "During the prevalence of the infection, £600 was raised by assessment in St. Giles's, besides voluntary contributions, viz.—

" From the Earl of Clare ... ..	£ 10 0 0
" the Lord Treasurer ... ..	50 0 0
" Earl Craven ... ..	40 0 0
" the rest of the Justices, &c. &c. ... ..	449 16 11

It appears from another entry, that St. Giles's parish was considered to be entirely free from the Plague in July 1666. Mr. Parton mentions the report, that the infection "came with cotton imported from Turkey."

principal sort of people sent thither were, as I have said, servants, who got the distemper by going of errands to fetch necessaries for the families where they lived; and who, in that case, if they came home sick, were removed to preserve the rest of the house, and they were so well looked after there, in all the time of the visitation, that there were but 159 buried in all at the London pest-house, and 156 at that of Westminster.

By having more pest-houses, I am far from meaning a forcing all people into such places. Had the shutting up of houses been omitted, and the sick hurried out of their dwellings to pest-houses as some proposed, it seems, at that time, as well as since, it would certainly have been much worse than it was; the very removing the sick would have been a spreading of the infection, and the rather because that removing could not effectually clear the house, where the sick person was, of the distemper; and the rest of the family, being then left at liberty, would certainly spread it among others:

The methods also in private families, which would have been universally used to have concealed the distemper, and to have concealed the persons being sick, would have been such, that the distemper would sometimes have seized a whole family before any visitors, or examiners, could have known of it: on the other hand, the prodigious numbers which would have been sick at a time, would have exceeded all the capacity of public pest-houses to receive them, or of public officers to discover and remove them.

This was well considered in those days, and I have heard them talk of it often. The magistrates had enough to do to bring people to submit to having their houses shut up, and many ways they deceived the watchmen, and got out, as I have observed; but that difficulty made it apparent that they would have found it impracticable to have gone the other way to work; for they could never have forced the sick people out of their beds and out of their dwellings; it must not have been my Lord Mayor's officers, but an army of officers that must have attempted it; and the people, on the other hand, would have been enraged and desperate, and would have killed those that should have offered to have meddled with them, or with their children and relations, whatever had befallen them for it; so that they would have made the people, who, as it was, were in the most terrible distraction imaginable; I say, they would have made them stark mad; whereas the magistrates found it proper on several accounts to treat them with lenity and compassion, and not with violence and terror, such as dragging the sick out of their houses, or obliging them to remove themselves, would have been.

This leads me again to mention the time when the plague first began, that is to say, when it became certain that it would spread over the whole town, when, as I have said, the better sort of people first took the alarm, and began to hurry themselves out of town. It was true, as I observed in its place, that the throng was so great, and the coaches, horses, waggons and carts were so many, driving and dragging the people away, that it looked as if all the city was running away; and had any regulations been published that had been terrifying at that time, especially such as would pretend to dispose of the people, otherwise than they would dispose of themselves, it would have put both the city and suburbs into the utmost confusion.

But the magistrates wisely caused the people to be encouraged, made very good by-laws for the regulating the citizens, keeping good order in the streets, and making everything as eligible as possible to all sorts of people.

In the first place, the Lord Mayor and the sheriffs, the Court of Aldermen, and a certain number of the Common-council men, or their deputies, came to a resolution and published it; viz.,—“That they would not quit the city themselves, but that they would be always at hand for the preserving good order in every place, and for the doing justice on all occasions; as also for the distributing the public charity to the poor; and, in a word, for the doing the duty, and discharging the trust reposed in them by the citizens, to the utmost of their power.”*

In pursuance of these orders, the Lord Mayor, sheriffs, &c., held councils every day more or less, for making such dispositions as they found needful for preserving the civil peace; and though they used the people with all possible gentleness and clemency, yet all manner of presumptuous rogues, such as thieves, house-breakers, plunderers of the dead, or of the sick, were duly punished, and several declarations were continually published by the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen against such.

Also all constables and churchwardens were enjoined

* The following advertisement was published in the “Intelligencer” of August the 7th, No. 64:—

“Whereas since the appointment of two physicians to administer to the infected in and about the city,—the plague is so increased that it is requisite there should be a greater number to take care of the sick,—be it known that Dr. Nicholas Davis, a member of the King’s College of Physicians, living in Austin Friars, and Dr. Edw. D’Awtry, a member of the same society, living in Broad-street, being two of those physicians that were presented by the College to the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen of the City of London, for prevention and cure of the plague, have thought fit, upon principles of honour and conscience, to declare that they are ready and willing to attend the said service, and to visit all such persons in and about this city and countries adjacent, as shall desire their assistance and directions ” to stay in the city upon severe penalties, or to depute such able and sufficient house-keepers, as the deputy aldermen, or common-councilmen of the precinct should approve, and for whom they should give security; and also security in case of mortality, that they would forthwith constitute other constables in their stead.

These things re-established the minds of the people very much, especially in the first of their fright, when they talked of making so universal a flight, that the city would have been in danger of being entirely deserted of its inhabitants, except the poor; and the country of being plundered and laid waste by the multitude. Nor were the magistrates deficient in performing their part as boldly as they promised it: for my Lord Mayor and the sheriffs were continually in the streets, and at places of the greatest danger, and though they did not care for having too great a resort of people crowding about them, yet in emergent cases, they never denied the people access to them, and heard with patience all their grievances and complaints. My Lord Mayor had a low gallery built on purpose in his hall, where he stood a little removed from the crowd when any complaint came to be heard, that he might appear with as much safety as possible.

Likewise the proper officers, called my Lord Mayor's officers, constantly attended in their turns, as they were in waiting; and if any of them were sick or infected, as some of them were, others were instantly employed to fill up and officiate in their places, till it was known whether the other should live or die.

In like manner the sheriffs and aldermen did in their several stations and wards, where they were placed by office; and the sheriffs' officers or sergeants were appointed to receive orders from the respective aldermen in their turn; so that justice was executed in all cases without interruption. In the next place, it was one of their particular cares to see the orders for the freedom of the markets observed; and in this part either the Lord Mayor, or one or both of the sheriffs, were every market-day on horseback to see their orders executed, and to see that the country people had all possible encouragement and freedom in their coming to the markets, and going back again; and that no nuisances nor frightful objects should be seen in the streets to terrify them, or make them unwilling to come. Also the bakers were taken under particular order, and the master of the bakers' company was, with his court of assistants, directed to see the order of my Lord Mayor for their regulation put in execution, and the due assize of bread, which was weekly appointed by my Lord Mayor, observed; and all the bakers were obliged to keep their ovens going constantly, on pain of losing the privileges of a freeman of the city of London.

By this means bread was always to be had in plenty, and as cheap as usual, as I said above; and provisions were never wanting in the markets, even to such a degree that I often wondered at it, and reproached myself with being so timorous and cautious in stirring abroad, when the country people came freely and boldly to market, as if there had been no manner of infection in the city, or danger of catching it.

It was, indeed, one admirable piece of conduct in the said magistrates, that the streets were kept constantly clear, and free from all manner of frightful objects, dead bodies, or any such things as were indecent or unpleasant, unless where anybody fell down suddenly or died in the streets, as I have said above; and these were generally covered with some cloth or blanket, or removed into the next church-yard till night. All the needful works that carried terror with them that were both dismal and dangerous, were done in the night; if any diseased bodies were removed, or dead bodies buried, or infected clothes burnt, it was done in the night; and all the bodies which were thrown into the great pits in the several church-yards or burying-grounds, as has been observed, were so removed in the night; and everything was covered and closed before day. So that in the day-time there was not the least signal of the calamity to be seen or heard of, except what was to be observed from the emptiness of the streets, and sometimes from the passionate outcries and lamentations of the people out at their windows, and from the number of houses and shops shut up.

Nor was the silence and emptiness of the streets so much in the city as in the out-parts; except just at one particular time, when, as I have mentioned, the Plague came east, and spread over all the city.* It was indeed a merciful disposition of God, that, as the Plague began at one end of the town first, as has been observed at large, so it proceeded progressively to other parts, and did not come on this way or eastward, till it had spent its fury in

* The "Newes," No. 54, contains a royal proclamation, dated London, July 12, 1665, commanding that a general Fast should be kept on account of the "heavy Judgment of Plague and Pestilence." This solemnity was ordered to be observed in London and the parts adjacent, on the said 12th of July; and in all other parts of the realm on the 2nd of August following. A form of prayer was prepared and published by the Bishops, and charitable collections were made in the churches and chapels. In the same paper, No. 56 (July the 19th), is this passage:—"Their Majesties with the Court are (God be praised) in good health, and still at Hampton Court; but the Plague is much increased in the outskirts of this city, where effectually the miseries of a close and smothering confinement contribute not a little to the fatality of the disease. The last week's bill of the Plague amounted to 1089, of which number, 867 dyed in ten of the out-parishes; and even of them it may be fairly calculated, that poverty and sluttishness have destroyed the one-half. Within the walls of the city there dyed only 56; and very few of those but in close and blind alleys."

the west part of the town; and so as it came on one way it abated another: for example:—

It began at St. Giles's and the Westminster end of the town, and it was in its height in all that part by about the middle of July, viz., in St. Giles's in the Fields, St. Andrew's Holborn, St. Clement's Danes, St. Martin's in the Fields, and in Westminster. The latter end of July, it decreased in those parishes, and coming east, it increased prodigiously in Cripplegate, St. Sepulchre's, St. James's, Clerkenwell, and St. Bride's and Aldersgate: while it was in all these parishes, the city and all the parishes of the Southwark side of the water, and all Stepney, Whitechapel, Aldgate, Wapping, and Ratcliff, were very little touched; so that people went about their business unconcerned, carried on their trades, kept open their shops, and conversed freely with one another in all the city, the east and north-east suburbs, and in Southwark, almost as if the plague had not been among us.

Even when the north and north-west suburbs were fully infected, viz., Cripplegate, Clerkenwell, Bishopsgate, and Shoreditch, yet still all the rest were tolerably well: for example:—

From the 25th of July to the 1st of August, the bill stood thus of all diseases:—

St. Giles's, Cripplegate	-	554	Stepney parish	-	-	-	127
St. Sepulchre's	-	250	Aldgate	-	-	-	92
Clerkenwell	-	103	Whitechapel	-	-	-	104

So that, in short, there died more that week, in the two parishes of Cripplegate and St. Sepulchre, by forty-eight, than in all the city, all the east suburbs, and all the Southwark parishes put together. This caused the reputation of the city's health to continue all over England, and especially in the counties and markets adjacent, from whence our supply of provisions chiefly came, even much longer than that health itself continued; for when the people came into the streets from the country, by Shoreditch and Bishopsgate, or by Old-street and Smithfield, they would see the out-streets empty, and the houses and shops shut, and the few people that were stirring there walk in the middle of the streets; but when they came within the city, there things looked better, and the markets and shops were open, and the people walking about the streets as usual, though not quite so many; and this continued till the latter end of August and the beginning of September.

But then the case altered quite, the distemper abated in the west and north-west parishes, and the weight of the infection lay on the city and the eastern suburbs, and the Southwark side, and this in a frightful manner.*

Then, indeed, the city began to look dismal, shops to be shut, and the streets desolate; in the High-street indeed, necessity made people stir abroad on many occasions; and * Pepys, under the date of August the 12th, has this entry:—"The people die so, that now it seems they are fain to carry the dead to be buried by day-light, the nights not suffering to do it in. And the Lord Mayor commands people to be within at nine at night; all, as they say, that the sick may have liberty to go abroad for air." A few days after he remarks, that the "streets were empty of people," and that two shops in three, if not more, were shut up.

In the "Newes" of August the 29th (No. 71), it is said: "The late increase of the sickness, in and about this town, besides that the judgment is in itself just and dreadful, has been undoubtedly promoted by the incorrigible license of the multitudes that resort to public funerals, contrary both to order and reason; and it is here humbly presented as a suggestion to those that have authority and power to prevent it; to which may be added the shallow burying of the dead in several places, where the bodies are piled even to the level of the ground; and thereby poison the whole neighbourhood."

there would be in the middle of the day a pretty many people, but in the mornings and evenings scarce any to be seen even there, no not in Cornhill and Cheapside.

These observations of mine were abundantly confirmed by the weekly bills of mortality for those weeks, an abstract of which, as they respect the parishes which I have mentioned, and as they make the calculations I speak of very evident, take as follows:—

The weekly bill which makes out this decrease of the burials in the west and north side of the city, stands thus:—

Here is a strange change of things indeed, and a sad change it was, and had it held for two months more than it did, very few people would have been left alive: but then such, I say, was the merciful disposition of God, that when it was thus, the west and north part, which had been so dreadfully visited at first, grew, as you see, much better; and as the people disappeared here, they began to look abroad again there; and the next week or two altered it still more, that is, more to the encouragement of the other part of the town: for example:—

And now the misery of the city, and of the said east and south parts, was complete indeed; for as you see the weight of the distemper lay upon those parts, that is to say, on the city, the eight parishes over the river, and the parishes of Aldgate, Whitechapel, and Stepney. And this was the time that the bills came up to such a monstrous height, as that I mentioned before; and that eight or nine, and as I believe, ten or twelve thousand a week died; for it is my settled opinion, that they never could come at any just account of the numbers, for the reasons which I have given already.

Nay, one of the most eminent physicians, who has since published in Latin an account of those times, and of his observations, says, that in one week there died twelve thousand people, and that particularly there died four thousand in one night,* though I do not remember that there ever was any such particular night, so remarkably fatal, as that such a number died in it. However, all this confirms what I have said above of the uncertainty of the bills of mortality, &c., of which I shall say more hereafter.

And here let me take leave to enter again, though it may seem a repetition of circumstances, into a description of the miserable condition of the city itself, and of those parts where I lived at this particular time. The city and those other parts, notwithstanding the great numbers of people that were gone into the country, were vastly full of people, and perhaps the fuller, because people had for a long time a strong belief, that the Plague would not come into the city, nor into Southwark; † no, nor into Wapping, nor Ratcliff at all; nay, such was the assurance of the people on that head, that many removed from the suburbs on the west and north sides, into those eastern and south sides, as for safety, and as I verily believe, carried the Plague amongst them there, perhaps sooner than they would otherwise have had it.

Here also I ought to leave a farther remark for the use of posterity, concerning the manner of people's infect-

* De Foe is here referring to Dr. Hodges's "Loimologia," although with a little disingenuousness he affects slightly to question his correctness. The original passage is a remarkable one, as may be seen in a former note. Vide p. 230.

† In a letter from Mr. Oldenburg to the Honourable Robert Boyle, dated July 4th, 1665, the writer says,—“It is a great mercy that Southwark and Rotherhithe, where seamen are so numerous, and other people that relate to and work in the navy, remain so free yet of the contagion, that there are not above two houses shut up in those quarters.”—Boyle's "Works," vol. vi. p. 187.

ing one another ; namely, that it was not the sick people only from whom the Plague was immediately received by others what were sound, but THE WELL. To explain myself :—by the sick people, I mean those who were known to be sick, had taken their beds, had been under cure, or had swellings and tumours upon them, and the like ; these every body could beware of, they were either in their beds, or in such condition as could not be concealed.

By the well, I mean such as had received the contagion, and had it really upon them, and in their blood, yet did not show the consequences of it in their countenances, nay, even were not sensible of it themselves, as many were not, for several days. These breathed death in every place and upon every body who came near them ; nay, their very clothes retained the infection, their hands would infect the things they touched, especially if they were warm and sweaty, and they were generally apt to sweat too.

Now it was impossible to know these people, nor did they sometimes, as I have said, know themselves to be infected : these were the people that so often dropped down and fainted in the streets ; for often-times they would go about the streets, to the last, till on a sudden they would sweat, grow faint, sit down at a door, and die. It is true, finding themselves thus, they would struggle hard to get home to their own doors, or at other times would be just able to go into their houses, and die instantly ; other times they would go about till they had the very tokens come out upon them, and yet not know it, and would die in an hour or two after they came home, but be well as long as they were abroad. These were the dangerous people : these were the people of whom the well people ought to have been afraid ; but then, on the other side, it was impossible to know them.

And this is the reason why it is impossible in a visitation to prevent the spreading of the Plague by the utmost human vigilance, viz., that it is impossible to know the infected people from the sound; or that the infected people should perfectly know themselves. I knew a man who conversed freely in London all the season of the Plague, in 1665, and kept about him an antidote or cordial, on purpose to take when he thought himself in any danger, and he had such a rule to know, (or have warning of the danger by,) as indeed I never met with before nor since; how far it may be depended on I know not. He had a wound in his leg, and whenever he came among any people that were not sound, and the infection began to affect him, he said he could know it by that signal, viz., that his wound in his leg would smart, and look pale and white; so as soon as ever he felt it smart, it was time for him to withdraw, or to take care of himself, taking his drink, which he always carried about him for that purpose. Now it seems he found his wound would smart many times when he was in company with such who thought themselves to be sound, and who appeared so to one another; but he would presently rise up, and say publicly, —“Friends, here is somebody in the room that has the Plague:” and so would immediately break up the company.* This was indeed a faithful monitor to all people, that the Plague is not to be avoided by those that converse promiscuously in a town infected: people have it when they know it not, and they likewise give it to others

* An incidental notice of the above kind occurs in the Correspondence published in Boyle's "Works," (vol. vi. p. 429: edit. 1772,) where it is said on the authority of a person "known for many years to be creditable," that "a good old woman, near eighty (now deceased), said often in his hearing, that she could know if the Plague were within thirty miles of her, by a pain she had in three Plague sores; which sores she had in her younger days, before she was married"

when they know not that they have it themselves. In this case, shutting up the WELL, or removing the SICK, will not remove the danger, unless they can go back and shut up all those that the sick had conversed with, even before they knew themselves to be sick, and none knows how far to carry that back or where to stop; for none knows when, or where, or how, they may have received the infection, or from whom.

This I take to be the reason which makes so many people talk of the air being corrupted and infected, and that they need not be cautious of whom they converse with, for that the contagion was in the air. I have seen them in strange agitations and surprises on this account. "I have never come near any infected body!" says the disturbed person, "I have conversed with none but sound healthy people, and yet I have gotten the distemper!"—"I am sure I am struck from heaven," says another, and he falls to the serious part. Again, the first goes on exclaiming, "I have come near no infection, nor any infected person; I am sure it is in the air: we draw in death when we breathe, and therefore 'tis the hand of God; there is no withstanding it." And this at last made many people, being hardened to the danger, grow less concerned at it, and less cautious towards the latter end of the time, and when it was come to its height, than they were at first; then with a kind of a Turkish predestinarianism, they would say, "If it pleased God to strike them, it was all one whether they went abroad or stayed at home, they could not escape it," and therefore they went boldly about even into infected houses, and infected company, visited sick people, and in short, lay in the beds with their wives or relations when they were infected; and what was the consequence? but the same that is the consequence in Turkey, and in those countries where they do those things; namely, that they were infected too, and died by hundreds and thousands.

I would be far from lessening the awe of the judgments of God, and the reverence to his Providence, which ought always to be on our minds on such occasions as these. Doubtless, the visitation itself is a stroke from Heaven upon a city, or country, or nation where it falls; a messenger of His vengeance, and a loud call to that nation, or country, or city, to humiliation and repentance, according to that of the prophet Jeremiah xviii. 7, 8: "At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom to pluck up, and to pull down, and destroy it; if that nation against whom I have pronounced turn from their evil, I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them."—Now to prompt due impressions of the awe of God on the minds of men on such occasions, and not to lessen them, it is that I have left these minutes upon record.

I say, therefore, I reflect upon no man for putting the reason of those things upon the immediate hand of God, and the appointment and direction of his providence; nay, on the contrary, there were many wonderful deliverances of persons from infection, and deliverances of persons when infected, which intimate singular and remarkable providence, in the particular instances to which they refer; and I esteem my own deliverance to be one next to miraculous, and do record it with thankfulness.

But when I am speaking of the Plague as a distemper arising from natural causes, we must consider it as it was really propagated by natural means, nor is it at all the less a judgment for its being under the conduct of human causes and effects; for as the divine power has formed the whole scheme of nature, and maintains nature in its course; so the same power thinks fit to let his own actings with men, whether of mercy or judgment, to go on in the ordinary course of natural-causes, and he is pleased to act by those natural causes as the ordinary means; excepting and reserving to himself, nevertheless, a power to act in a supernatural way when he sees occasion. Now, it is evident that, in the case of an infection, there is no apparent extraordinary occasion for supernatural operation, but the ordinary course of things appears sufficiently armed, and made capable of all the effects that Heaven usually directs by a contagion. Among these causes and effects, this of the secret conveyance of infection imperceptible and unavoidable, is more than sufficient to execute the fierceness of divine vengeance, without putting it upon supernaturals and miracle.

The acute penetrating nature of the disease itself was such, and the infection was received so imperceptibly, that the most exact caution could not secure us while in the place: but I must be allowed to believe, (and I have so many examples fresh in my memory to convince me of it that I think none can resist their evidence,) I say, I must be allowed to believe, that no one in this whole nation ever received the sickness or infection but who received it in the ordinary way of infection from some body, or the clothes, or touch, or stench of some body, that was infected before.

The manner of its coming first to London, proves this also, viz., by goods brought over from Holland, and brought thither from the Levant; the first breaking of it out in a house in Long-acre, where those goods were carried and first opened; its spreading from that house to other houses, by the visible unwary conversing with those who were sick, and the infecting the parish officers who were employed about the persons dead, and the like: these are known authorities for this great foundation point, namely, that it went on, and proceeded from person to person, and from house to house, and no otherwise. In the first house that was infected there died four persons; a neighbour hearing the mistress of the first house was sick, went to visit her, and went home and gave the distemper to her family, and died, and all her household. A minister who called to pray with the first sick person in the second house, was said to sicken immediately, and die with several more in his house. Then the physicians began to consider, for they did not at first dream of a general contagion. But the physicians being sent to inspect the bodies, they assured the people that it was neither more nor less than the Plague, with all its terrifying particulars, and that it threatened an universal infection; so many people having already conversed with the sick or distempered, and having, as might be supposed, received infection from them, that it would be impossible to put a stop to it.

Here the opinion of the physicians agreed with my observation afterwards, namely, that the danger was spreading insensibly; for the sick could infect none but those that came within the reach of the sick person; but that one man, who may have really received the infection, and knows it not, but goes abroad and about as a sound person, may give the plague to a thousand people, and they to greater numbers in proportion, and neither the person giving the infection, nor the persons receiving it, know anything of it, and perhaps not feel the effects of it for several days after.

For example:—Many persons in the time of this visitation never perceived that they were infected till they found, to their unspeakable surprise, the tokens come out upon them, after which they seldom lived six hours; for those spots they called the tokens were really gangrenous spots, or mortified flesh, in small knobs as broad as a little silver penny, and hard as a piece of callus or horn, so that when the disease was come up to that length, there was nothing could follow but certain death, and yet, as I said, they knew nothing of their being infected, nor found themselves so much as out of order, till those mortal marks were upon them: but everybody must allow that they were infected in a high degree before, and must have been so some time; and consequently their breath, their sweat, their very clothes, were contagious for many days before.

This occasioned a vast variety of cases, which physicians would have much more opportunity to remember than I; but some came within the compass of my observation or hearing, of which I shall name a few.

A certain citizen who had lived safe and untouched, till the month of September, when the weight of the distemper lay more in the city than it had done before, was mighty cheerful, and something too bold, as I think it was, in his talk of how secure he was, how cautious he had been, and how he had never come near any sick body. Says another citizen (a neighbour of his) to him, one day, "Do not be too confident, Mr. —, it is hard to say who is sick and who is well; for we see men alive and well, to outward appearance, one hour, and dead the next."—"That is true," says the first man, for he was not a man presumptuously secure, but had escaped a long while; and men, as I said above, especially in the city, began to be over easy upon that score. "That is true," says he, "I do not think myself secure, but I hope I have not been in company with any person that there has been any danger in.”—“No!” says his neighbour, “was not you at the Bull-head tavern, in Gracechurch-street, with Mr. —, the night before last?”—“Yes,” says the first, “I was; but there was nobody there that we had any reason to think dangerous.” Upon which his neighbour said no more, being unwilling to surprise him; but this made him more inquisitive, and, as his neighbour appeared backward to reply, he was the more impatient, and in a kind of warmth, says he aloud, “Why, he is not dead, is he?” Upon which his neighbour still was silent, but cast up his eyes, and said something to himself; at which the first citizen turned pale, and said no more but this, “Then I am a dead man too,” and went home immediately, and sent for a neighbouring apothecary to give him something preventive, for he had not yet found himself ill; but the apothecary opening his breast, fetched a sigh, and said no more but this, “Look up to God!” and the man died in a few hours.

Now, let any man judge from a case like this, if it be possible for the regulations of magistrates, either by shutting up the sick or removing them, to stop an infection which spreads itself from man to man, even while they are perfectly well [in appearance], and insensible of its approach, and may be so for many days.

It may be proper to ask here, how long it may be supposed men might have the seeds of the contagion in them before it discovered itself in this fatal manner; and how long they might go about seemingly whole, and yet be contagious to all those that came near them? I believe the most experienced physicians cannot answer this question directly any more than I can; and something an ordinary observer may take notice of, which may pass their observation. The opinion of physicians abroad seems to be, that it may lie dormant in the spirits or in the blood-vessels a very considerable time; why else do they exact a quarantine of those who come into their harbours and ports from suspected places? Forty days is, one would think, too long for nature to struggle with such an enemy as this, and not conquer it or yield to it; but I could not think, by my own observation, that they can be infected so as to be contagious to others above fifteen or sixteen days at farthest; and on that score it was, that when a house was shut up in the city, where any one had died of the Plague, and nobody appeared to be ill in the family for sixteen or eighteen days after, they were not so strict, but that they would connive at their going privately abroad; nor would people be much afraid of them afterwards, but rather think they were fortified the better, having not been vulnerable when the enemy was in their own house; yet we sometimes found it had lain much longer concealed.

Upon the foot of all these observations, I must say, that though Providence seemed to direct my conduct to be otherwise, yet, it is my opinion, and I must leave it as a prescription, viz., that the best physic against the Plague is to run away from it. I know people encourage themselves by saying, "God is able to keep us in the midst of danger, and able to overtake us when we think ourselves out of danger;" and this kept thousands in the town, whose carcasses went into the great pits by cart-loads, and who, if they had fled from the danger, had, I believe, been safe from the disaster; at least, 'tis probable they had been safe.

And were this very fundamental only duly considered by the people, on any future occasion of this or the like nature, I am persuaded it would put them upon quite different measures for managing the people from those that they took in 1665, or than any that have been taken abroad, that I have heard of; in a word, they would consider of separating the people into smaller bodies, and removing them in time farther from one another, and not let such a contagion as this, which is indeed chiefly dangerous to collected bodies of people, find a million of people in a body together, as was very near the case before, and would certainly be the case if it should ever appear again.

The Plague is like a great fire, which if a few houses only are contiguous where it happens, can only burn a few houses; or if it begins in a single, or, as we call it, a lone house, can only burn that lone house where it begins: but if it begins in a close-built town or city, and gets a head, there its fury increases, it rages over the whole place, and consumes all it can reach.

I could propose many schemes on the foot of which the government of this city, if ever they should be under the apprehensions of such another enemy (God forbid they should!) might ease themselves of the greatest part of the dangerous people that belong to them; I mean such as the begging, starving, labouring poor, and among them chiefly those who, in case of a siege, are called the useless mouths; who being then prudently, and to their own advantage disposed of, and the wealthy inhabitants disposing of themselves, and of their servants, and children, the city, and its adjacent parts, would be so effectually evacuated, that there would not be above a tenth part of its people left together, for the disease to take hold upon. But suppose them to be a fifth part, and that two hundred and fifty thousand people were left, and if it did seize upon them, they would by their living so much at large, be much better prepared to defend themselves against the infection, and be less liable to the effects of it, than if the same number of people lived close together in one small city, such as Dublin or Amsterdam, or the like.

It is true, hundreds, yea, thousands of families fled away at this last Plague, but then of them, many fled too late, and not only died in their flight, but carried the distemper with them into the countries where they went, and infected those whom they went among for safety; which confounded the thing, and made that be a propagation of the distemper which was the best means to prevent it; and this too is an evidence of it, and brings me back to what I only hinted at before, but must speak more fully to here, namely, that men went about apparently well many days after they had the taint of the disease in their vitals, and after their spirits were so seized as that they could never escape it; and that all the while they did so, they were dangerous to others. I say, this proves that so it was; for such people infected the very towns they went through, as well as the families they went among; and it was by that means that almost all the great towns in England had the distemper among them more or less; and always they would tell you such a Londoner or such a Londoner brought it down.

It must not be omitted, that when I speak of those people who were really thus dangerous, I suppose them to be utterly ignorant of their own condition; for if they really knew their circumstances to be such as indeed they were, they must have been a kind of wilful murderers, if they would have gone abroad among healthy people, and it would have verified indeed the suggestion which I mentioned above, and which I thought seemed untrue, viz., that the infected people were utterly careless as to giving the infection to others, and rather forward to do it than not; and I believe it was partly from this very thing, that they raised that suggestion, which I hope was not really true in fact.

I confess no particular case is sufficient to prove a general, but I could name several people within the knowledge of some of their neighbours and families yet living, who showed the contrary to an extreme. One man, a master of a family in my neighbourhood, having the distemper, he thought he had it given him by a poor workman whom he employed, and whom he went to his house to see, or went for some work that he wanted to have finished, and he had some apprehensions even while he was at the poor workman's door, but did not discover it fully; but the next day it discovered itself, and he was taken very ill: upon which he immediately caused himself to be carried into an out-building which he had in his yard, and where there was a chamber over a work-shop, the man being a brazier; here he lay, and here he died, and would be tended by none of his neighbours, but by a nurse from abroad, and would not suffer his wife, nor children, nor servants, to come up into the room, lest they should be infected; but sent them his blessing and prayers for them by the nurse, who spoke it to them at a distance, and all this for fear of giving them the distemper, and without which, he knew as they were kept up, they could not have it.

And here I must observe also that the Plague, as I suppose all distempers do, operated in a different manner on differing constitutions. Some were immediately overwhelmed with it, and it came to violent fevers, vomitings, insufferable headaches, pains in the back, and so up to ravings and ragings with those pains; others with swellings and tumours in the neck or groin, or arm-pits, which, till they could be broke, put them into insufferable agonies and torment; while others, as I have observed, were silently infected, the fever preying upon their spirits insensibly, and they seeing little of it, till they fell into swooning, and faintings, and death, without pain.*

I am not physician enough to enter into the particular reasons and manner of these differing effects of one and the same distemper, and of its differing operation in several bodies; nor is it my business here to record the observations which I really made, because the doctors themselves have done that part much more effectually than I can do, and because my opinion may in some things differ from theirs. I am only relating what I know, or have heard, or believe, of the particular cases, and what fell within the compass of my view, and the different nature of the infection, as it appeared in the particular cases which I have related; but this may be added to, that though the former sort of those cases, namely, those openly visited, were the worst for themselves as to pain, I mean those that had such fevers, vomitings, headaches, pains, and swellings, because they died in such a dreadful manner, yet the latter had the worst state of the disease; for in the former they frequently recovered, especially if the swellings broke, but the latter was inevitable death; no cure, no help, could be possible, nothing could follow but death: and it was worse also to others, because, as above, it secretly, and unperceived by others, or by themselves, communicated death to those they conversed with, the penetrating poison insinuating itself into their blood in a manner which it is impossible to describe, or indeed conceive.

“Pestis Descriptio. Pestis est morbus ab aura venenata, subtilissima, maxime exitiosa, simul ac contagiosa, complures eodem tempore diversarum regionum corripiciens, a peculiari potissimum Spiritus Nitro-aërei alteratione velut corruptiva ortus, cum Febre ut plurimum, et aliorum symptomatum perquam gravissimorum satellitio stipatus.” Hodges’s “Loimologia: sive Pestis nuperæ apud Populum Londinensem grassantis Narratio Historica.” 1671, 8vo. p. 39.

“Plague generally commences with rigour or shivering—followed by heat, accelerated pulse, headache, depression of spirits, vomiting, or diarrhœa, and oppression of the chest. These are succeeded by a burning sensation at the pit of the stomach, a peculiar appearance of the eyes, styled a muddiness, by coma, delirium; and in some cases death takes place suddenly, before the distinctive appearances of buboes and carbuncles occur. But in other instances the symptoms increase in violence more gradually, and after the characteristic swellings are seen purple spots, ecchymoses and petechiæ, the usual forerunners of death.”—Dr. Rees’s Cyclopædia.

This infecting and being infected, without so much as its being known to either person, is evident from two sorts of cases, which frequently happened at that time; and there is hardly anybody living who was in London during the infection, but must have known several of the cases of both sorts.

First.—Fathers and mothers have gone about as if they had been well, and have believed themselves to be so, till they have insensibly infected, and been the destruction of their whole families: which they would have been far from doing, if they had had the least apprehensions of their being unsound and dangerous themselves. A family, whose story I have heard, was thus infected by the father, and the distemper began to appear upon some of them, even before he found it upon himself; but searching more narrowly, it appeared he had been infected some time, and as soon as he found that his family had been poisoned by himself, he went distracted and would have laid violent hands upon himself, but was kept from that by those who looked to him, and in a few days he died.

Secondly.—The other particular is, that many people having been well to the best of their own judgment, or by the best observation which they could make of themselves for several days, finding only a decay of appetite, or a light sickness upon their stomachs; nay, some whose appetite has been strong, and even craving, and only a light pain in their heads, have sent for physicians to know what ailed them, and have been found, to their great surprise, at the brink of death, the tokens upon them, or the Plague grown up to an incurable height.

It was very sad to reflect how such a person as this last-mentioned above, had been a walking destroyer, perhaps for a week or fortnight before that; how he had ruined those that he would have hazarded his life to save, and had been breathing death upon them, even perhaps in his tender kissing and embracings of his own children. Yet thus certainly it was, and often has been, and I could give many particular cases where it has been so. If, then, the blow is thus insensibly stricken; if the arrow flies thus unseen, and cannot be discovered; to what purpose are all the schemes for shutting up or removing the sick people? Those schemes cannot take place but upon those that appear to be sick, or to be infected; whereas there are among them, at the same time, thousands of people who seem to be well, but are all that while carrying death with them into all companies which they come into.

This frequently puzzled our physicians, and especially the apothecaries and surgeons, who knew not how to discover the sick from the sound; they all allowed that it was really so, that many people had the Plague in their very blood, and preying upon their spirits, and were in themselves but walking putrified carcasses, whose breath was infectious, and their sweat poison; and yet were as well to look on as other people, and even knew it not themselves:—I say, they all allowed that it was really true, in fact, but they knew not how to propose a discovery.*

My friend, Dr. Heath, was of opinion that it might be known by the smell of their breath; but then, as he said, who durst smell to that breath for his information? since to know it, he must draw the stench of the Plague up into his own brain, in order to distinguish the smell! I have heard it was the opinion of others, that it might be distinguished by the party's breathing upon a piece of glass, where the breath condensing, there might living creatures be seen by a microscope, of strange, monstrous, and frightful shapes, such as dragons, snakes, serpents, and devils, horrible to behold: but this I very much question the truth of, and we had no microscopes at that time, as I remember, to make the experiment with.†

It was the opinion also of another learned man, that the breath of such a person would poison and instantly kill a bird, not only a small bird, but even a cock or hen, and that if it did not immediately kill the latter, it would cause them to be rousy, as they call it; and particularly * De Foe is here creating a mystery of what, from his own premises, must be open and apparent. No person could possibly come into society in the condition which he has described, without its being immediately known that they were infected. Their very looks would betray them.

† These fanciful speculations would be curious, if they had any other origin than the imagination of the author.—In regard to the remark that “we had no microscopes at that time,” De Foe is in error. The microscope was known to, if not invented by, the celebrated Galileo, about the beginning of the 17th century, and much improved by the Jausens, one of whose microscopes was shown in the court of James the First, by Cornelius Drebbel in 1619. The compound microscope was the invention of Fontana, an Italian; but it was afterwards greatly improved by the sagacious Lewenhoeek, who bequeathed twenty-six of his best microscopes to the Royal Society, with which he had corresponded on the subject of microscopical inquiries as early as 1673. Hooke's “Micrographia” was published in the very year of the Great Plague.

that if they had laid any eggs at that time, they would be all rotten. But those are opinions which I never found supported by any experiments, or heard of others that had seen it; so, I leave them as I find them, only with this remark, namely, that I think the probabilities are very strong for them.

Some have proposed that such persons should breathe hard upon warm water, and [have inferred] that they would leave an unusual scum upon it, or upon several other things, especially such as are of a glutinous substance, and are apt to receive a scum and support it.

But from the whole I found, that the nature of this contagion was such that it was impossible to discover it at all, or to prevent its spreading from one to another, by any human skill.

There was, indeed, one difficulty, which I could never thoroughly get over to this time, and which there is but one way of answering that I know of, and it is this, viz., the first person that died of the plague was on December 20th, or thereabouts, 1664,* and in or about Long Acre; whence the first person had the infection was generally said to be from a parcel of silks imported from Holland, and first opened in that house.

But after this, we heard no more of any person dying of the Plague, or of the distemper being in that place, till the 9th of February, which was about seven weeks after, and then one more was buried out of the same house. Then it was hushed, and we were perfectly easy as to the public for a great while; for there were no more entered in the weekly bill to be dead of the Plague till the 22nd of April, when there were two more buried, not out of the same house, but out of the same street; and, as near as I can remember, it was out of the next house to the first. This was nine weeks asunder, and after this we had no more till a fortnight, and then it broke out in several streets, and spread every way.* Now the question seems to lie thus:—“Where lay the seeds of the infection all this while? How came it to stop so long, and not stop any longer?” Either the distemper did not come immediately by contagion from body to body, or if it did, then a body may be capable to continue infected, without the disease discovering itself, many days, nay, weeks together,—even not a quarantine of days only, but a soixantine, not only forty days, but sixty days, or longer.

It is true, there was, as I observed at first, and is well known to many yet living, a very cold winter, and a long frost, which continued three months, and this, the doctors say, might check the infection: but then the learned must allow me to say, that if, according to their notion, the disease was, as I may say, only frozen up, it would, like a frozen river, have returned to its usual force and current when it thawed, whereas the principal recess of this infection, which was from February to April, was after the frost was broken, and the weather mild and warm.

But there is another way of solving all this difficulty, which I think my own remembrance of the thing will supply; and that is, the fact is not granted, namely, that there died none [of the Plague] in those long intervals, viz., from the 20th of December to the 9th of February, and from thence to the 22nd of April. The weekly bills are the only evidence on the other side, and those bills were not of credit enough, at least with me, to support an hypothesis, or determine a question of such importance as this. For it was our received opinion at that time, and I believe upon very good grounds, that the fraud lay in the parish officers, searchers, and persons appointed to give account of the dead, and what diseases they died of; and as people were very loath at first to have the neighbours believe their houses were infected, so they gave money to procure, or otherwise procured, the dead persons to be returned as dying of other distempers.* This I know was practised afterwards in many places, I believe I might say in all places where the distemper came, as will be seen by the vast increase of the numbers placed in the weekly bills under other articles of diseases, during the time of the infection. For example;—in the months of July and August, when the Plague was coming on to its highest pitch, it was very ordinary to have from a thousand to twelve hundred, nay, to almost fifteen hundred a week of other distempers; not that the numbers in those distempers were really increased to such a degree, but that a great number of families and houses where really the infection was, obtained the favour to have their dead

* There is some exaggeration here, as will be seen by the following extracts from the weekly bills.—From May 2nd to the 9th, nine persons died of the Plague; from the 9th to the 16th, three persons; from the 16th to the 23rd, fourteen persons; from the 23rd to the 30th, seventeen persons; from the 30th, to June 6th, forty-three persons; from the 6th to the 13th, one hundred and twelve persons; and from the 13th to the 20th, one hundred and sixty-eight persons. It was only in the latter month, therefore, that the Plague began “to spread every way,” and to make that rapid progress, which by the 10th of October had extended the infection throughout every parish except one, connected with the metropolis.

* There are two or three entries in "Pepys's Diary," which give support to the above surmise. Under the date of August the 30th, he says, that the clerk of his own parish stated that he returned but six, although nine had died there of the Plague that week. On the following day he wrote:—"In the city died this week, 7496, and of them 6102 of the Plague: but it is feared that the true number of the dead this week is near 10,000: partly from the poor that cannot be taken notice of, through the greatness of the number, and partly from the Quakers and others that will not have any bell ring for them."

There were several other articles which bore a proportion to these; and which, it is easy to perceive, were increased on the same account, as aged, consumptions, vomitings, imposthumes, gripes, and the like: many of which were not doubted to be infected people; but as it was of the utmost consequence to families not to be known to be infected, if it was possible to avoid it, so they took all the measures they could to have it not believed; and if any died in their houses, to get them returned to the examiners, and by the searchers, as having died of other distempers.

This, I say, will account for the long interval which, as I have said, was between the dying of the first persons that were returned in the bill to be dead of the Plague, and the time when the distemper spread openly, and could not be concealed.

Besides, the weekly bills themselves, at that time, evidently discover this truth; for, while there was no mention of the Plague, and no increase after it had been mentioned, yet it was apparent that there was an increase of those distempers which bordered nearest upon it; for example, there were eight, twelve, seventeen of the spotted fever in a week, when there were none, or but very few of the Plague; whereas before, one, three, or four were the ordinary weekly numbers of that distemper. Likewise, as I observed before, the burials increased weekly in that particular parish, and the parishes adjacent, more than in any other parish; although there were none set down of the Plague; all which tells us, that the infection was handed on, and the succession of the distemper really preserved, though it seemed to us at that time to be ceased, and to come again in a manner surprising.

It might be also, that the infection might remain in other parts of the same parcel of goods which at first it came in, and which might not be perhaps opened, or, at least, not fully; or in the clothes of the first infected person; for I cannot think that anybody could be seized with the contagion in a fatal and mortal degree for nine weeks together, and support his state of health so well, as even not to discover it to themselves;—yet, if it were so, the argument is the stronger in favour of what I am saying, namely, that the infection is retained in bodies apparently well, and conveyed from them to those they converse with, while it is known to neither the one nor the other.

Great were the confusions at that time upon this very account; and when people began to be convinced that the infection was received in this surprising manner from persons apparently well, they began to be exceeding shy and jealous of every one that came near them. Once on a public day, whether a Sabbath day or not I do not remember, in Aldgate church, in a pew full of people, on a sudden, one fancied she smelt an ill smell; immediately she fancies the Plague was in the pew, whispers her notion or suspicion to the next, then rises and goes out of the pew; it immediately took with the next, and so to them all; and every one of them, and of the two or three adjoining pews, got up and went out of the church, nobody knowing what it was offending them, or from whom.

This immediately filled everybody's mouths with one preparation or other, such as the old women directed, and some, perhaps, as physicians directed, in order to prevent infection by the breath of others; insomuch, that if we came to go into a church, when it was anything full of people, there would be such a mixture of smells at the entrance, that it was much more strong, though perhaps less wholesome, than if you were going into an apothecary's or druggist's shop. In a word, the whole church was like a smelling-bottle; in one corner it was all perfumes, in another aromatics, balsamics, and variety of drugs and herbs; in another salts and spirits; as every one was furnished for their own preservation. Yet I observed, that after people were possessed, as I have said, with the belief, or rather assurance, of the infection being thus carried on by persons apparently in health, the churches and meeting-houses were much thinner of people than at other times before that they used to be; for this is to be said of the people of London, that, during the whole time of the pestilence, the churches or meetings were never wholly shut up, nor did the people decline coming out to the public worship of God, except only in some parishes, when the violence of the distemper was more particularly in that parish at that time; and even then, no longer than it continued to be so.

Indeed nothing was more strange than to see with what courage the people went to the public service of God, even at that time when they were afraid to stir out of their own houses upon any other occasion; this I mean before the time of desperation, which I have mentioned already. This was a proof of the exceeding populousness of the city, at the time of the infection; for notwithstanding the great numbers that were gone into the country at the first alarm, and that fled out into the forests and woods when they were further terrified with the extraordinary increase of it, when we came to see the crowds and throngs of people which appeared on the sabbath days at the churches, and especially in those parts of the town where the plague was abated, or where it was not yet come to its height, it was amazing! but of this I shall speak again presently. I return, in the meantime, to the article of infecting one another at first. Before people came to right notions of the infection, and of infecting one another, people were only shy of those that were really sick;—a man with a cap upon his head, or with cloths round his neck, which was the case of those that had swellings there; such were indeed frightful. But when we saw a gentleman dressed, with his band on, and his gloves in his hand, his hat upon his head, and his hair combed, of such we had not the least apprehensions; and people would converse a great while freely, especially with their neighbours and such as they knew. But when the physicians assured us that the danger was as well from the sound, that is, the seemingly sound, as the sick: and that those people who thought themselves entirely free, were oftentimes the most fatal; and that it came to be generally understood that people were sensible of it, and of the reason of it; then, I say, they began to be jealous of everybody, and a vast number of people locked themselves up, so as not to come abroad into any company at all, nor suffer any that had been abroad in promiscuous company to come into their houses, or near them: at least not so near them as to be within the reach of their breath, or of any smell from them: and when they were obliged to converse at a distance with strangers, they would always have preservatives in their mouths, and about their clothes, to repel and keep off the infection.

It must be acknowledged, that when people began to use these cautions, they were less exposed to danger, and the infection did not break into such houses so furiously as it did into others, before; and thousands of families were preserved (speaking with due reserve to the direction of Divine Providence) by that means.

But it was impossible to beat anything into the heads of the poor: they went on with the usual impetuosity of their tempers, full of outcries and lamentations when taken, but madly careless of themselves, foolhardy and obstinate, while they were well. Where they could get employment they pushed into any kind of business, the most dangerous and the most liable to infection ; and if they were spoken to, their answer would be—“ I must trust to God for that : If I am taken, then I am provided for, and there is an end of me,” and the like ; or thus—“ Why, what must I do ? I cannot starve ; I had as good have the Plague as perish for want : I have no work ; what could I do ? I must do this or beg.” Suppose it was burying the dead, or attending the sick, or watching infected houses, which were all terrible hazards ; but their tale was generally the same. It is true, necessity was a very justifiable warrantable plea, and nothing could be better ; but their way of talk was much the same where the necessities were not the same. This adventurous conduct of the poor was that which brought the Plague among them in a most furious manner, and this, joined to the distress of their circumstances, when taken, was the reason why they died so by heaps ; for I cannot say I could observe one jot of better husbandry among them, I mean the labouring poor, while they were all well, and getting money, than there was before, but as lavish, as extravagant, and as thoughtless for to-morrow as ever ; so that when they came to be taken sick, they were immediately in the utmost distress, as well for want as for sickness, as well for lack of food as lack of health.

The misery of the poor I had many occasions to be an eyewitness of, and sometimes also of the charitable assistance that some pious people daily gave to such, sending them relief and supplies both of food, physic, and other help, as they found they wanted. And, indeed, it is a debt of justice due to the temper of the people of that day, to take notice here, that not only great sums, very great sums of money were charitably sent to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen for the assistance and support of the poor distempered people; but abundance of private people daily distributed large sums of money for their relief, and sent people about to inquire into the condition of particular distressed and visited families, and relieved them. Nay, some pious ladies were so transported with zeal in so good a work, and so confident in the protection of Providence in discharge of the great duty of charity, that they went about in person distributing alms to the poor, and even visiting poor families, though sick and infected, in their very houses, appointing nurses to attend those that wanted attending, and ordering apothecaries and surgeons; the first to supply them with drugs or plasters, and such things as they wanted; and the last to lance and dress the swellings and tumours, where such were wanting; giving their blessing to the poor in substantial relief to them, as well as hearty prayers for them.

I will not undertake to say, as some do, that none of those charitable people were suffered to fall under the calamity itself; but this I may say, that I never knew any one of them that miscarried, which I mention for the encouragement of others in case of the like distress; and, doubtless, if "they that give to the poor, lend to the Lord, and he will repay them," those that hazard their lives to give to the poor, and to comfort and assist the poor in such a misery as this, may hope to be protected in the work.

Nor was this charity so extraordinarily eminent only in a few, but (for I cannot lightly quit this point) the charity of the rich, as well in the city and suburbs, as from the country, was so great that, in a word, a prodigious number of people, who must otherwise inevitably have perished for want, as well as sickness, were supported and subsisted by it; and though I could never, nor I believe any one else, come to a full knowledge of what was so contributed, yet I do believe that, as I heard one say who was a critical observer of that part, there was not only many thousand pounds contributed, but many hundred thousand pounds, to the relief of the poor of this distressed afflicted city; nay, one man affirmed to me that he could reckon up above one hundred thousand pounds a-week, which was distributed by the churchwardens at the several parish vestries, by the Lord Mayor and the Aldermen in the several wards and precincts, and by the particular direction of the Court and of the Justices, respectively, in the parts where they resided, over and above the private charity distributed by pious hands in the manner I speak of; and this continued for many weeks together.

I confess this is a very great sum; but if it be true, that there was distributed in the parish of Cripplegate only, 17,800*l.* in one week,* to the relief of the poor, as I heard reported, and which I really believe was true, the other may not be improbable.

It was doubtless to be reckoned among the many signal good Providences which attended this great city, and of which there were many other worth recording; I say, this was a very remarkable one, that it pleased God thus to move the hearts of the people in all parts of the kingdom, so cheerfully to contribute to the relief and support of the poor at London; the good consequences of which were felt many ways, and particularly in preserving the lives and recovering the health of so many thousands, and keeping so many thousands of families from perishing and starving.

* Notwithstanding the assurance given in the text, it is altogether incredible that such a large sum as £17,800 could have been expended at Cripplegate for the above purpose within a single week. Even at the last enumeration in 1831, the entire population of Cripplegate parish amounted only to 13,134.

And now I am talking of the merciful disposition of Providence in this time of calamity, I cannot but mention again, though I have spoken several times of it already on other accounts, I mean that of the progression of the distemper; how it began at one end of the town, and proceeded gradually and slowly from one part to another, and like a dark cloud that passes over our heads, which, as it thickens and overcasts the air at one end, clears up at the other end: so while the plague went on raging from west to east, as it went forwards east, it abated in the west, by which means those parts of the town which were not seized, or which were left, and where it had spent its fury, were (as it were) spared to help and assist the other;—whereas, had the distemper spread itself over the whole city and suburbs at once, raging in all places alike, as it has done since in some places abroad, the whole body of the people must have been overwhelmed, and there would have died twenty thousand a-day, as they say there did at Naples, nor would the people have been able to have helped or assisted one another.

For it must be observed that where the Plague was in its full force, there indeed the people were very miserable, and the consternation was inexpressible. But a little before it reached even to that place, or presently after it was gone, they were quite another sort of people, and I cannot but acknowledge, that there was too much of that common temper of mankind to be found among us all at that time; namely, to forget the deliverance when the danger is past; but I shall come to speak of that part again.

It must not be forgot here to take some notice of the state of trade during the time of this common calamity, and this with respect to foreign trade, as also to our home trade.*

As to foreign trade, there needs little to be said; the trading nations of Europe were all afraid of us, and no port of France, or Holland, or Spain, or Italy, would admit our ships or correspond with us: indeed we stood on ill terms with the Dutch, and were in a furious war with them, though but in a bad condition to fight abroad; who had such dreadful enemies to struggle with at home.

Our merchants accordingly were at a full stop, their ships could go nowhere, that is to say, to no place abroad; their manufactures and merchandise, that is to say of our growth, would not be touched abroad: they were as much afraid of our goods as they were of our people; and indeed they had reason, for our woollen manufactures are as retentive of infection as human bodies, and if packed up by persons infected, would receive the infection, and be as dangerous to touch as a man would be that was infected; and, therefore, when any English vessel arrived in foreign countries, if thy did take the goods on shore, they always caused the bales to be opened and aired in places appointed for that purpose.

* How greatly the home trade must have suffered during this visitation, may in some degree be appreciated by the tenor of a proclamation which was made at Edinburgh on the 14th of July, 1665, prohibiting all trade and commerce until the first of November following, between the kingdom of Scotland and all infected towns and villages whatsoever. No goods to be landed from vessels coming from suspected places without the permission of magistrates, and with proper precautions. Persons coming from England, or bringing commodities by land-carriage, to stay on the borders, and converse with no person without leave of a sheriff, justice of the peace, or municipal magistrate. Seamen, pilots, and fishermen, forbidden to go on board any vessel coming from beyond sea without a magistrate's warrant, &c.

Only a week prior to the above, a proclamation had been issued in England, forbidding the annual fair to be held in St. James's church-yard, Bristol, on account of the Plague. Other proclamations were made in August, prohibiting the holding of St. Bartholomew's fair, in London, and Stourbridge fair, in Cambridgeshire, on the same account.

But from London, they would not suffer them to come into port, much less to unlade their goods, upon any terms whatever; and this strictness was especially used with them in Spain and Italy. In Turkey, and the islands of the Arches [Archipelago] indeed, as they are called, as well those belonging to the Turks as to the Venetians, they were not so very rigid: in the first there was no obstruction at all; and four ships which were then in the river loading for Italy, that is, for Leghorn and Naples, being denied product [pratique], as they called it, went on to Turkey, and were freely admitted to unlade their cargo without any difficulty, only that when they arrived there, some of their cargo was not fit for sale in that country; and other parts of it being consigned to merchants at Leghorn, the captains of the ships had no right, nor any orders, to dispose of the goods; so that great inconveniences followed to the merchants. But this was nothing but what the necessity of affairs required, and the merchants at Leghorn and Naples having notice given them, sent again from thence to take care of the effects, which were particularly consigned to those ports, and to bring back in other ships such as were improper for the markets at Smyrna and Scanderoon.

The inconveniences in Spain and Portugal were still greater, for they would by no means suffer our ships, especially those from London, to come into any of their ports, much less to unlade. There was a report that one of our ships having by stealth delivered her cargo, among which were some bales of English cloth, cotton, kerseys, and such-like goods, the Spaniards caused all the goods to be burnt, and punished the men with death who were concerned in carrying them on shore. This I believe was in part true, though I do not affirm it; but it is not at all unlikely, seeing the danger was really very great, the infection being so violent in London.

I heard likewise that the Plague was carried into those countries by some of our ships, and particularly into the port of Faro in the kingdom of Algarve, belonging to the king of Portugal; and that several persons died of it there: but it was not confirmed.

On the other hand, though the Spaniards and Portuguese were so shy of us, it is most certain that the Plague, as has been said, keeping at first much at that end of the town next Westminster, the merchandising part of the town, such as the city and the water side, was perfectly sound, till at least the beginning of July; and the ships in the river till the beginning of August; for, to the first of July, there had died but seven within the whole city, and but sixty within the liberties: only one in all the parishes of Stepney, Aldgate, and Whitechapel; and but two in all the eight parishes of Southwark. But it was the same thing abroad, for the bad news was gone over the whole world, that the city of London was infected with the Plague; and there was no inquiring there how the infection proceeded, nor at which part of the town it was begun, or was reached to.

Besides, after it began to spread, it increased so fast, and the bills grew so high, all on a sudden, that it was to no purpose to lessen the report of it, or endeavour to make the people abroad think it better than it was, the account which the weekly bills gave in was sufficient, and that there died from two thousand to three or four thousand a week, was sufficient to alarm the whole trading part of the world, and the following time being so dreadful also in the very city itself, put the whole world, I say, upon their guard against it.

You may be sure, also, that the report of these things lost nothing in the carriage; the Plague was itself very terrible, and the distress of the people very great, as you may observe by what I have said; but the rumour was infinitely greater, and it must not be wondered that our friends abroad, as my brother's correspondents in particular were told there, namely, in Portugal and Italy, where he chiefly traded, that in London there died twenty thousand in a week; that the dead bodies lay unburied by heaps; that the living were not sufficient to bury the dead, nor the sound to look after the sick; that all the kingdom was infected likewise, so that it was a universal malady, such as was never heard of in those parts of the world. And they could hardly believe us, when we gave them an account how things really were, and how there was not above one-tenth part of the people dead; that there was five hundred thousand left, that lived all the time in the town; and that, now the people began to walk the streets again, and those who were fled to return, there was no miss of the usual throng of people in the streets, except as every family might miss their relations and neighbours, and the like. I say, they could not believe these things; and if inquiry were now to be made in Naples, or in other cities on the coast of Italy, they would tell you that there was a dreadful infection in London so many years ago; in which, as above, there died twenty thousand in a week, &c., just as we have had it reported in London that there was a Plague in the city of Naples, in the year 1656, in which there died twenty thousand people in a day; of which I have had very good satisfaction that it was utterly false.*

* The plague at Naples in 1656 was far more destructive than that which desolated London nine years afterwards. It is stated in the "Universal History," (vol. 25, p. 168,) that it raged so violently in that

But these extravagant reports were very prejudicial to our trade, as well as unjust and injurious in themselves; for it was a long time after the Plague was quite over, before our trade could recover itself in those parts of the world; and the Flemings and Dutch, but especially the last, made very great advantages from having all the market to themselves, and even buying our manufactures in the several parts of England where the Plague was not, and carrying them to Holland and Flanders, and from thence transporting them to Spain and to Italy, as if they had been of their own making.

But they were detected sometimes and punished, that is to say, their goods confiscated, and ships also; for if it was true, that our manufactures, as well as our people, were infected, and that it was dangerous to touch or to open, and receive the smell of them; then those people ran the hazard by that clandestine trade, not only of carrying the contagion into their own country, but also of infecting the nations to whom they traded with those goods: which, considering how many lives might be lost in consequence of such an action, must be a trade that no men of conscience could suffer themselves to be concerned in.

I do not take upon me to say, that any harm was done, I mean of that kind, by those people. But I doubt I need city as to destroy 400,000 of the inhabitants in less than six months; and that for some time, in the month of July, the deaths amounted daily to 15,000. Superstitious processions, and other ill-advised measures, carried the infection into every part of the city; and the general calamity was increased by the seditious tumults of the populace, who were infuriated by the belief that the disorder had been designedly introduced by the Spaniards; and that people in disguise were going through the city "sowing poisoned dust." So strong was the excitement thus produced, that the Viceroy of Naples judged it expedient to pacify the mob, by causing an unfortunate criminal to be broken upon the wheel, under pretence that he was "a disperser of the dust!"

not make any such proviso in the case of our own country ; for either by our people of London, or by the commerce, which made their conversing with all sorts of people in every country, and of every considerable town necessary ; I say, by this means the Plague was first or last spread all over the kingdom, as well in London, as in all the cities and great towns, especially in the trading manufacturing towns and seaports ; so that first or last, all the considerable places in England were visited more or less, and the kingdom of Ireland in some places, but not so universally : how it fared with the people in Scotland, I had no opportunity to inquire.*

It is to be observed that while the Plague continued so violent in London, the out-ports, as they are called, enjoyed a very great trade, especially to the adjacent countries, and to our own plantations ; for example, the towns of Colchester, Yarmouth, and Hull, on that side of England, exported to Holland and Hamburgh, the manufactures of the adjacent counties for several months after the trade with London was, as it were, entirely shut up ; likewise the cities of Bristol and Exeter, with the port of Plymouth, had the like advantage to Spain, to the Canaries, to Guinea, and to the West Indies, and particularly to Ireland. But as the Plague spread itself every way after it had been in London to such a degree as it was in August and September, so all or most of those cities and towns were infected first or last ; and then trade was, as it were, under a general embargo, or at a full stop, as I shall observe farther, when I speak of our home trade.

One thing, however, must be observed, that as to ships

* On the 16th of August, 1665, a Proclamation was published at Edinburgh, for a General Fast to be kept throughout Scotland on the second Wednesday in September ; from which it appears that the pestilence had not extended to Scotland at that time.

coming in from abroad, as many you may be sure did, some who were out in all parts of the world a considerable while before, and some who when they went out knew nothing of an infection, or at least of one so terrible: these came up the river boldly, and delivered their cargoes as they were obliged to do, except just in the two months of August and September, when the weight of the infection lying, as I may say, all below bridge, nobody durst appear in business for a while. But as this continued but for a few weeks, the homeward-bound ships, especially such whose cargoes were not liable to spoil, came to an anchor for a time, short of the Pool,* or fresh water part of the river, even as low as the river Medway, where several of them ran in, and others lay at the Nore, and in the Hope below Gravesend; so that by the latter end of October, there was a very great fleet of homeward-bound ships to come up, such as the like had not been known for many years.

Two particular trades were carried on by water carriage all the while of the infection, and that with little or no interruption, very much to the advantage and comfort of the poor distressed people of the city, and those were the coasting trade for corn, and the Newcastle trade for coals.

The first of these was particularly carried on by small vessels from the port of Hull, and other places on the Humber, by which great quantities of corn were brought in from Yorkshire and Lincolnshire; the other part of this corn trade was from Lynn in Norfolk, from Wells, and Burnham, and from Yarmouth, all in the same county; and the third branch was from the river Medway, and from Milton, Faversham, Margate, and Sandwich, and all the other little places and ports round the coasts of Kent and Essex.

* That part of the river where the ships lie up when they come home is called the Pool, and takes in all the river, on both sides of the water, from the Tower to Cuckold's Point and Limehouse.

There was also a very good trade from the coast of Suffolk, with corn, butter, and cheese. These vessels kept a constant course of trade, and without interruption came up to that market, known still by the name of Bear-key, where they supplied the city plentifully with corn, when land carriage began to fail, and when the people began to be sick of coming from many places in the country.

This also was much of it owing to the prudence and conduct of the Lord Mayor, who took much care to keep the masters and seamen from danger when they came up; causing their corn to be bought off at any time they wanted a market (which, however, was very seldom), and causing the corn-factors immediately to unlade and deliver the vessels loaden with corn, that they had very little occasion to come out of their ships or vessels, the money being always carried on board to them, and put into a pail of vinegar before it was carried.

The second trade was that of coals from Newcastle upon Tyne, without which the city would have been greatly distressed; for not in the streets only, but in private houses and families, great quantities of coals were then burnt, even all the summer long, and when the weather was hottest, which was done by the advice of the physicians. Some indeed opposed it, and insisted that to keep the houses and rooms hot was a means to propagate the distemper, which was a fermentation and heat already in the blood; that it was known to spread and increase in hot weather, and abate in cold; and therefore they alleged that all contagious distempers are the worse for heat, because the contagion was nourished and gained strength in hot weather, and was, as it were, propagated in heat.

Others said,—they granted that heat in the climate might propagate infection, as sultry hot weather fills the air with vermin, and nourishes innumerable numbers and kinds of venomous creatures, which breed in our food, in the plants, and even in our bodies, by the very stench of which infection may be propagated; also that heat in the air, or heat of weather, as we ordinarily call it, makes bodies relax and faint, exhausts the spirits, opens the pores, and makes us more apt to receive infection, or any evil influence, be it from noxious pestilential vapours, or any other thing in the air;—but that the heat of fire, and especially of coal fires, kept in our houses or near us, had a quite different operation, the heat being not of the same kind, but quick and fierce, tending not to nourish, but to consume and dissipate all those noxious fumes, which the other kind of heat rather exhaled, and stagnated, than separated, and burnt up: besides, it was alleged, that the sulphurous and nitrous particles, that are often found to be in the coal, with that bituminous substance which burns, are all assistant to clear and purge the air, and render it wholesome and safe to breathe in, after the noxious particles (as above) are dispersed and burnt up.

The latter opinion prevailed at that time, and as I must confess I think with good reason, and the experience of the citizens confirmed it, many houses which had constant fires kept in the rooms, having never been infected at all: and I must join my experience to it, for I found the keeping of good fires kept our rooms sweet and wholesome, and I do verily believe made our whole family so, more than would otherwise have been.

But I return to the coals as a trade. It was with no little difficulty that this trade was kept open, and particularly because as we were in an open war with the Dutch at that time, the Dutch Capers at first took a great many of our collier ships, which made the rest cautious, and made them to stay to come in fleets together. But after some time, the Capers were either afraid to take them, or their masters, the states, were afraid they should, and forbade them, lest the Plague should be among them, which made them fare the better.

For the security of those northern traders, the coal ships were ordered by my Lord Mayor, not to come up into the Pool above a certain number at a time; and he ordered lighters, and other vessels, such as the wood-mongers, that is the wharf-keepers, or coal-sellers furnished, to go down and take out the coals as low as Deptford and Greenwich, and some farther down.

Others delivered great quantities of coals in particular places, where the ships could come to the shore, as at Greenwich, Blackwall, and other places, in vast heaps, as if to be kept for sale; but they were then fetched away, after the ships which brought them were gone; so that the seamen had no communication with the river men, nor so much as came near one another.

Yet all this caution could not effectually prevent the distemper getting among the colliery, that is to say, among the ships, by which a great many seamen died of it; and that which was still worse, was that they carried it down to Ipswich and Yarmouth, to Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and other places on the coast; where, especially at Newcastle and at Sunderland, it carried off a great number of people.

The making of so many fires as above, did indeed consume an unusual quantity of coals; so that upon one or two stops of the ships coming up, whether by contrary weather, or by the interruption of enemies, I do not remember, the price of coals was exceeding dear, even as high as 4*l*.* a chaldron; but it soon abated when the ships came in, and as afterwards they had a freer passage, the price was very reasonable all the rest of that year.

The public fires which were made on these occasions, as I have calculated it, must necessarily have cost the city about 200 chaldrons of coal a-week if they had continued, which was indeed a very great quantity; but as it was thought necessary, nothing was spared: however, as some of the physicians cried them down, they were not kept alight above four or five days. The fires were ordered thus:

One at the Custom House, one at Billingsgate, one at Queenhithe, and one at the Three Cranes; one in Blackfriars, and one at the gate of Bridewell; one at the corner of Leadenhall street, and Gracechurch; one at the north and one at the south gate of the Royal Exchange; one at Guildhall, and one at Blackwell-Hall gate; one at the Lord Mayor's door in St. Helen's, one at the west entrance into St. Paul's, and one at the entrance into Bow Church. I do not remember whether there was any at the City gates, but one at the Bridge foot there was, just by St. Magnus' Church.†

* It was probably on this occasion of the coals rising so high, and in order to defeat the cupidity of the dealers, that an Act of Common Council was passed (bearing date of the first of June, 1665,) "for the benefit and relief of the Poor in times of dearth and scarcity," &c., by which the City Companies were ordered to purchase and lay up, yearly, between Lady-day and Michaelmas, 7510 chaldrons of coals, that the same might be vended in dear times, at such prices as the Lord Mayor and Aldermen should direct; so that the same should not be sold to loss. The number of chaldrons to be purchased by each Company, is particularly specified in the Act.

† The fires were far more numerous than De Foe has here specified, and, as will be seen by the Proclamation, vide Appendix, No. IV., they were ordered to be kindled in "all Streets, Courts, Lanes, and Alleys,

I know some have quarrelled since that, at the experiment, and said, that there died the more people because of those fires; but I am persuaded those that say so, offer no evidence to prove it, neither can I believe it on any account whatever.*

It remains to give some account of the state of trade at home in England, during this dreadful time; and particularly as it relates to the manufactures, and the trade in the city. At the first breaking out of the infection, there was, as it is easy to suppose, a very great fright among the people, and consequently a general stop of trade, except in provisions and necessaries of life; and even in those things, as there was a vast number of people fled, and a very great number always sick, besides the number which died, so there could not be above two-thirds, if above one-half, of the consumption of provisions in the city as used to be.

It pleased God to send a very plentiful year of corn of the City and Suburbs thereof; and, in fact, one fire between every twelve houses. In the "Newes," of September the 7th, (No. 73.) is this paragraph:—

"London, Sept. 6th.—In pursuance of the Order of the Rt. Hon. the Lord Mayor, mentioned in our last, for making of fires throughout all the streets of London, and Liberties thereof, to be continued for three whole days and nights, as an expedient which has been used in other places in times of pestilence with very good effect: Yesternight, at the hour appointed, the fires were kindled, and are to be kept burning till the said three days and nights shall be expired: the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs employing their utmost diligence, in this, as upon all other occasions wherein the honour and safety of this glorious City are concerned: of which their care it is a considerable proof and instance that in this sad time, there is issued out of the Chamber of London £600 weekly, for the relief of the poor, which must otherwise have perished by extreme want."

* De Foe's belief cannot controvert the positive fact that the mortality most grievously increased, from the very night that the fires were lit, until nearly the end of the month. The deaths in August, from all causes, are stated in the Bills of Mortality at 25,427; in September (inclusive of two days in August), at 30,699; and in October (inclusive of four days in September), at 17,201. Dr. Hodges's testimony on this point may be seen in a former note: vide p. 223.

and fruit, but not of hay or grass ; by which means bread was cheap by reason of the plenty of corn ; flesh was cheap by reason of the scarcity of grass ; but butter and cheese were dear for the same reason ; and hay in the market, just beyond Whitechapel bars, was sold at 4*l.* per load. But that affected not the poor : there was a most excessive plenty of all sorts of fruit, such as apples, pears, plums, cherries, grapes ; and they were the cheaper because of the want of people ; but this made the poor eat them to excess, and this brought them into fluxes, griping of the guts, surfeits, and the like, which often precipitated them into the Plague.

But to come to matters of trade :—First, foreign exportation being stopped, or at least very much interrupted, and rendered difficult, a general stop of all those manufactures followed of course, which were usually bought for exportation ; and though sometimes merchants abroad were importunate for goods, yet little was sent : the passages being so generally stopt that the English ships would not be admitted, as is said already, into their port.

This put a stop to the manufactures that were for exportation in most parts of England, except in some out-ports, and even that was soon stopped, for they all had the Plague in their turn. But though this was felt all over England, yet what was still worse, all intercourse of trade for home consumption of manufactures, especially those which usually circulated through the Londoners' hands, was stopped at once, the trade of the city being stopped.

All kinds of handicrafts in the city, &c., tradesmen and mechanics, were, as I have said before, out of employ, and this occasioned the putting off and dismissing an innumerable number of journeymen and workmen of all sorts, seeing nothing was done relating to such trades but what might be said to be absolutely necessary.

This caused the multitude of single people in London to be unprovided for, as also of families whose living depended upon the labour of the heads of those families: I say, this reduced them to extreme misery; and I must confess it is for the honour of the city of London, and will be for many ages, as long as this is to be spoken of, that they were able to supply with charitable provision the wants of so many thousands of those as afterwards fell sick, and were distressed; so that it may be safely averred that nobody perished for want, at least, that the magistrates had any notice given them of.*

This stagnation of our manufacturing trade in the country would have put the people there to much greater difficulties, but that the master workmen, clothiers, and others, to the uttermost of their stocks and strength, kept on making their goods to keep the poor at work, believing that as soon as the sickness should abate they would have a quick demand in proportion to the decay of their trade at that time; but, as none but those masters that were rich could do thus, and that many were poor and not able, the manufacturing trade in England suffered greatly, and the poor were pinched all over England by the calamity of the city of London only.

It is true, that the next year made them full amends by another terrible calamity upon the city; so that the city by one calamity impoverished and weakened the country, and by another calamity, even terrible too of its kind, it enriched the country, and made them again amends. For an infinite quantity of household stuff, wearing apparel, and other things, besides whole warehouses filled with merchandize and manufactures, such as come from all parts of England, were consumed in the Fire of London, the next year after this terrible visitation. It is incredible what a trade this made all over the whole kingdom, to make good the want, and to supply that loss; so that, in short, all the manufacturing hands in the nation were set on work, and were little enough, for several years, to supply the market and answer the demands. All foreign markets also were empty of our goods, by the stop which had been occasioned by the Plague, and before an open trade was allowed again; and the prodigious demand at home falling in, joined to make a quick vent for all sorts of goods; so that there never was known such a trade all over England for the time, as was in the first seven years after the Plague, and after the Fire of London.

* With the annexed limitation, the fact, as stated by De Foe, may possibly be admitted; yet the circumstances related in pages 123—130, include much evidence to the contrary.

It remains now that I should say something of the merciful part of this terrible judgment. The last week in September, the Plague being come to its crisis, its fury began to assuage.* I remember my friend Dr. Heath, coming to see me the week before told me, he was sure that

* In the "Newes" of September the 27th, (No. 79,) is this passage:—
"London, Sept. 27.—This place is infinitely revived by the blessed change which it hath pleased God in his goodness to vouchsafe us this week, and our prayers and hopes are, that it will prove but an earnest of a further mercy. The Burials are decreased according to the ordinary bills of Mortality 1837, this last week. The Mortality in all was 6460, and of the Plague 5533, whereof, in probability, according to the best judgment we can make of this week now current, there will be yet a greater abatement the next."

How different appearances were in the preceding week, may be conceived from a passage in Pepys, under the date of Sept. 20th, namely:—
"To Lambeth:—but Lord! what a sad time it is to see no boats upon the River; and grass grows all up and down Whitehall Court, and nobody but wretches in the streets! And what is worst of all, the Duke (of Albemarle) shewed us the number of the Plague this week, brought in last night from the Lord Mayor; that it is increased about the violence of it would assuage in a few days; but when I saw the weekly bill of that week, which was the highest of the whole year, being 8297 of all diseases, I upbraided him with it, and asked him what he had made his judgment from? His answer, however, was not so much to seek, as I thought it would have been. "Look you," says he, "by the number which are at this time sick and infected, there should have been twenty thousand dead the last week, instead of eight thousand, if the inveterate mortal contagion had been as it was two weeks ago; for then it ordinarily killed in two or three days, now not under eight or ten, and then not above one in five recovered; whereas, I have observed, that now not above two in five miscarry, and observe it from me, the next bill will decrease, and you will see many more people recover than used to do; for though a vast multitude are now every where infected, and as many every day fall sick, yet there will not so many die as there did, for the malignity of the distemper is abated;" adding, that he began now to hope, nay, more than hope, that the infection had passed its crisis, and was going off;—and accordingly so it was, for the next week being, as I said, the last in September, the bill decreased almost two thousand.

600 more than the last, which is quite contrary to our hopes and expectations, from the coldness of the late season."—Diary, vol. ii.

"Sinners, have you not read the black Bill of 6988 which died by the Plague the first week of this moneth, (September,) and 6544 which died by the Plague the second week? and do the bells sound a retreat of this enemy Death which hath got amongst us? Do the multitude of coffins which you see carried every hour to the grave speak a decrease of the Plague? Many thousands are fallen, and more thousands are like to fall, and who of you all that are in your sins, can reasonably hope to escape? Some of the righteous themselves do fall, and if God spareth not his own people, how can you think of preservation?"

It is true, the Plague was still at a frightful height, and the next bill was no less than 6460, and the next to that 5720; but still my friend's observation was just, and it did appear the people did recover faster, and more in number, than they used to do; and indeed, if it had not been so, what had been the condition of the city of London? For, according to my friend, there were not fewer than sixty thousand people at that time infected, whereof, as above, 24,477 died, and near 40,000 recovered; whereas, had it been as it was before, fifty thousand of that number would very probably have died, if not more, and fifty thousand more would have sickened; for in a word, the whole mass of people began to sicken, and it looked as if none would escape.

But this remark of my friend's appeared more evident in a few weeks more; for the decrease went on, and another week in October it decreased 1849; so that the number dead of the Plague was but 2665; and the next week it decreased 1413 more, and yet it was seen plainly that there was abundance of people sick, nay, abundance more than ordinary, and abundance fell sick every day, but (as above) the malignity of the disease abated.*

Such is the precipitant disposition of our people,—

* In the "Intelligencer," No. 80, under the date October 4th, is a passage corresponding with the above remark, viz., "The Bill of Mortality for this week has decreased 740, and we are encouraged to hope for a farther abatement—from the consideration of the distemper itself, which is observed not to be so mortal as it was, the greater part of the infected now escaping (death). On the 3rd of October, a Royal Proclamation was issued at Oxford, appointing a General Fast, on account of the Plague—to be kept November 8th, instead of All Saints' Day, which had been first fixed on:" All Saints' Day being a great festival of the church, and so not fit to be kept as a day of fasting and humiliation. Another Proclamation was issued on the 15th of October, adjourning the Courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, and Chancery, for a part of Michaelmas Term, from Westminster to Oxford. The Exchequer Court had been removed to Nonsuch, in Surrey, about the middle of August, previously.

whether it is so or not, all over the world, that is none of my particular business to inquire,—but I saw it apparently here, that as upon the first fright of the infection they shunned one another and fled from one another's houses, and from the city, with an unaccountable, and, as I thought, unnecessary fright; so now, upon this notion spreading, viz., that the distemper was not so catching as formerly, and that if it was caught, it was not so mortal, and seeing abundance of people, who really fell sick, recover again daily; they took to such a precipitant courage, and grew so entirely regardless of themselves, and of the infection, that they made no more of the Plague than of an ordinary fever, nor indeed so much; they not only went boldly into company with those who had tumours and carbuncles upon them, that were running, and consequently contagious, but ate and drank with them, nay, went into their houses to visit them, and even, as I was told, into their very chambers where they lay sick.

This I could not see rational. My friend Dr. Heath allowed, and it was plain to experience that the distemper was as catching as ever, and as many fell sick, but he alleged, that so many of those that fell sick did not die;—but I think that while many did die, and that, at best, the distemper itself was very terrible, the sores and swellings very tormenting, and the danger of death not left out of the circumstance of sickness, though not so frequent as before; that all those things, together with the exceeding tediousness of the cure, the loathsomeness of the disease, and many other articles, were enough to deter any man living from a dangerous mixture with the sick people, and make them as anxious almost to avoid the infection as before.

Nay, there was another thing which made the mere catching of the distemper frightful, and that was the terrible burning of the caustics, which the surgeons laid on the swellings to bring them to break, and to run; without which the danger of death was very great, even to the last: also the unsufferable torment of the swellings, which though it might not make people raving and distracted, as they were before, and as I have given several instances of already, yet they put the patient to inexpressible torment: and those that fell into it, though they did escape with life, yet they made bitter complaints of those that had told them there was no danger, and sadly repented their rashness and folly in venturing to run into the reach of it.

Nor did this unwary conduct of the people end here, for a great many that thus cast off their cautions suffered more deeply still; and though many escaped, yet many died; and at least, it had this public mischief attending it, that it made the decrease of burials slower than it would otherwise have been; for as this notion run like lightning through the city, and the people's heads were possessed with it, even as soon as the first great decrease in the bills appeared, we found that the two next bills did not decrease in proportion. The reason I take to be the people's running so rashly into danger, giving up all their former cautions and care, and all the shyness which they used to practise; depending that the sickness would not reach them; or that, if it did, they should not die.

standing the decrease of the distemper; terrifying them with the danger of bringing a relapse upon the whole city, and telling them how such a relapse might be more fatal and dangerous than the whole visitation that had been already; with many arguments and reasons to explain and prove that part to them, and which are too long to repeat here.

But it was all to no purpose: the audacious creatures were so possessed with the first joy, and so surprised with the satisfaction of seeing a vast decrease in the weekly bills, that they were impenetrable by any new terrors, and would not be persuaded but that the bitterness of death was passed; and it was to no more purpose to talk to them than to an east wind; but they opened shops, went about streets, did business, and conversed with any body that came in their way to converse with, whether with business, or without; neither inquiring of their health, nor so much as being apprehensive of any danger from them, though they knew them not to be sound.*

This imprudent rash conduct cost a great many their lives, who had with great care and caution shut themselves up, and kept retired as it were from all mankind, and had by that means, under God's providence, been preserved through all the heat of that infection.

* Pepys, under the date of November the 9th, says,—“The Bill of Mortality, to all our griefs, is increased 399 this week, and the increase is general through the whole City and Suburbs, which makes us all very sad.”—In the three following weeks, however, a decrease of the deaths from Plague, of 400 weekly, took place; and the “Intelligencer,” No. 94, after mentioning the decrease of deaths, Nov. 15th, says,—“The disease is not so mortal as formerly, which gives great ground of encouragement to the citizens, abundance returning out of the country whither they had retired during the heat of the contagion; so that now there begins to appear a face of trade again, and a very great freedom of conversation as in former times.” The general confidence, indeed, was so much restored by the end of November, that, as we learn from Pepys, the York waggon recommenced its journeys to the metropolis, it having discontinued travelling for several months prior to that time.

This rash and foolish conduct, I say, of the people went so far, that the ministers took notice to them of it at last, and laid before them both the folly and danger of it; and this checked it a little, so that they grew more cautious but it had another effect, which they could not check. For, as the first rumour had spread not over the city only but into the country, it had the like effect, and the people were so tired with being so long from London, and so eager to come back, that they flocked to town without fear or forecast, and began to show themselves in the streets as if all the danger was over: it was indeed surprising to see it, for though there died still from a thousand to eighteen hundred a week, yet the people flocked to town as if all had been well.

The consequence of this was, that the bills increased again four hundred the very first week in November; and if I might believe the physicians, there were about three thousand fell sick that week, most of them new comers too.

One John Cock, a barber in St. Martin's-le-Grand, was an eminent example of this; I mean of the hasty return of the people when the Plague was abated. This John Cock had left the town with his whole family, and locked up his house, and had gone into the country, as many others did, and finding the Plague so decreased in November, that there died but 905 per week of all diseases, he ventured home again. He had in his family ten persons, that is to say, himself and wife, five children, two apprentices, and a maid-servant: he had not been returned to his house above a week, and begun to open his shop, and carry on his trade, but the distemper broke out in his family, and within about five days they all died except one; that is to say, himself and wife, all his five children,

But the mercy of God was greater to the rest than we had reason to expect; for the malignity, as I have said, of the distemper was spent, the contagion was exhausted, and also the winter weather came on apace, and the air was clear and cold, with some sharp frosts; and this increasing still, most of those that had fallen sick recovered, and the health of the city began to return. There were, indeed, some returns of the distemper, even in the month of December, and the bills increased near a hundred, but it went off again, and so in a short while things began to return to their own channel.* And wonderful it was to see how populous the city was again all on a sudden; so that a stranger could not miss the numbers that were lost, neither was there any miss of the inhabitants as to their dwellings; few or no empty houses were to be seen, or, if there were some, there was no want of tenants for them.

I wish I could say, that as the city had a new face, so the manners of the people had a new appearance. I doubt * Under the date of December the 13th, Pepys wrote thus:—"The Plague is increased again this week, notwithstanding there hath been a long day or two great frosts; but we hope it is only the effects of the late close warm weather, and if the frost continue the next week, may fall again; but the town do thicken so much with people, that it is much if the Plague do not grow again upon us." On the 31st of the same month, he says,—“Many of such as I knew very well, are dead; yet to our great joy the town fills again, and shops begin to be open again. Pray God continue the Plague’s decrease, for that keeps the Court away from the place of business, and so all goes to wrack as to public matters.” On the 3rd of January, 1665-6, he remarks, that the Plague had decreased to 70 during the week, and that the deaths in all were only 253; “which is the least Bill known these twenty years in the City.” The latter fact he attributes to “the want of people in London.” This “want of people” must have continued some weeks longer in the Westminster parishes, since Pepys made the following entry on January the 19th:—"It is a remarkable thing how infinitely naked all that end of the town, Covent Garden, is at this day, of people; while the City is again almost as full of people as ever it was."—Diary vol. ii.

not but there were many that retained a sincere sense of their deliverance, and that were heartily thankful to that sovereign Hand that had protected them in so dangerous a time: it would be very uncharitable to judge otherwise in a city so populous, and where the people were so devout as they were here in the time of the visitation itself. But except what of this was to be found in particular families and faces, it must be acknowledged that the general practice of the people was just as it was before, and very little difference was to be seen.

Some, indeed, said things were worse, and that the morals of the people declined from this very time; that the people, hardened by the dangers that they had been in, like seamen after a storm is over, were more wicked and more stupid, more bold and hardened in their vices and immoralities than they were before; but I will not carry it so far neither. It would take up a history of no small length to give a particular of all the gradations by which the course of things in this city came to be restored again, and to run in their own channel as they did before.

Some parts of England were now infected as violently as London had been; the cities of Norwich, Peterborough, Lincoln, Colchester, and other places, were now visited;* and the magistrates of London began to set rules for our conduct as to corresponding with those cities. It is true, * Generally speaking, the Pestilence decreased in country towns in the winter months, as it did in London; and there were very few places indeed where it raged so violently as in the metropolis. The following article relating to its progress in the county of Durham appeared in the "Newes," No. 85—"Durham, Oct. 13th. The contagion in this country, which was brought hither about three months since, by certain passengers from London and Yarmouth, is now by the favour of God, much assuaged. Sunderland, where it was first brought, being now perfectly well; and the other infected places in a very hopeful condition. The sick persons are all of them removed out of the town into huts built in the fields at a convenient distance for that purpose, to the great cost and charge of this country."

we could not pretend to forbid their people coming to London, because it was impossible to know them asunder; so, after many consultations, the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen were obliged to drop it: all they could do was to warn and caution the people not to entertain in their houses or converse with any people who they knew came from such infected places.

But they might as well have talked to the air, for the people of London thought themselves so Plague-free now, that they were past all admonitions. They seemed to depend upon it, that the air was restored, and that the air was like a man that had the small-pox, not capable of being infected again; this revived that notion, that the infection was all in the air, that there was no such thing as contagion from the sick people to the sound; and so strongly did this whimsy prevail among people, that they ran altogether promiscuously, sick and well. Not the Mahometans, who prepossessed with the principle of predestination, value nothing of contagion, let it be in what it will, could be more obstinate than the people of London: they that were perfectly sound, and came out of the wholesome air, as we call it, into the city, made nothing of going into the same houses and chambers, nay, even into the same beds, with those that had the distemper upon them, and were not recovered.*

Some, indeed, paid for their audacious boldness with

* The ground-work of this part of De Foe's "Memoirs" was most probably suggested by the following passage in Hodges's "Loimologia," viz.—"The houses which before were full of the dead, were now again inhabited by the living; and the shops which had been most part of the year shut up, were again opened, and the people again cheerfully went about their wonted affairs of trade and employ; and even, what is almost beyond belief, those citizens who were before afraid even of their friends and relations, would, without fear, venture into the houses and rooms where infected persons had a little before breathed their last; nay, such comforts did inspire the languishing people, and such confidence, that many went into the beds where persons had died, even the price of their lives. An infinite number fell sick, and the physicians had more work than ever, only with this difference, that more of their patients recovered; that is to say, they generally recovered; but certainly there were more people infected, and fell sick now, when there did not die above a thousand or twelve hundred a week, than there was when there died five or six thousand a week; so entirely negligent were the people at that time, in the great and dangerous case of health and infection; and so ill were they able to take or accept of the advice of those who cautioned them for their good.

The people being thus returned, as it were, in general, it was very strange to find that, in their inquiring after their friends, some whole families were so entirely swept away that there was no remembrance of them left; neither was anybody to be found to possess or show any title to that little they had left; for in such cases, what was to be found was generally embezzled and purloined, some gone one way, some another.

It was said, such abandoned effects came to the king before they were cold or cleansed from the stench of the disease."—Loimologia, p. 27.

It is remarkable that Dr. George Pye (who published two "Discourses of the Plague," in 1721, in opposition to Dr. Mead's opinion on the contagious nature of the disorder) made the following erroneous comment on the above passage, namely:—"Here it is expressly affirmed that those who went near the sick, and even into their beds, did not catch this sickness, and yet the Pestilence was very far from being ceased at that time,"—and hence Dr. Pye infers, "we must conclude, that the Pestilence depended entirely on the constitution of the air, and was not at all communicated from sick persons."

Now Dr. Hodges does not affirm what is here attributed to him; nor is there any part in his work in which he makes the assertion that the sickness was not caught by those who acted in the rash and imprudent manner which he has described. The very fact of the mortality immediately increasing from 1031, in the last week of October, to 1414 and 1050 in the first and second weeks of November, which was the time when the citizens were fast returning to the infected houses, is a proof that many persons suffered for their temerity. It is very evident from Dr. Hodges's work that he himself considered the Plague to be contagious.

as the universal heir; upon which, we are told, and I suppose it was in part true, that the king granted all such as deodands to the Lord Mayor and court of Aldermen of London, to be applied to the use of the poor, of whom there were very many; for it is to be observed, that though the occasion of relief and the objects of distress were very many more in the time of the violence of the Plague than now after all was over, yet the distress of the poor was more now a great deal than it was then, because all the sluices of general charity were now shut. People supposed the main occasion to be over, and so stopped their hands; whereas particular objects were still very moving, and the distress of those that were poor was very great indeed.

Though the health of the city was now very much restored, yet foreign trade did not begin to stir, neither would foreigners admit our ships into their ports for a great while: as for the Dutch, the misunderstandings between our court and them had broken out into a war the year before, so that our trade that way was wholly interrupted; but Spain and Portugal, Italy and Barbary, as also Hamburgh, and all the ports in the Baltic, these were all shy of us a great while, and would not restore trade with us for many months.

The distemper sweeping away such multitudes, as I have observed, many, if not all the out-parishes, were obliged to make new burying-grounds besides that I have mentioned in Bunhill-fields, some of which were continued and remain in use to this day; but others were left off, and which, I confess, I mention it with some reflection, being converted into other uses, or built upon afterwards, the dead bodies were disturbed, abused, and dug up again; some even before the flesh of them was perished from the bones, and removed like dung or rubbish to other places : some of those which came within the reach of my observations were as follow :—

First.—A piece of ground beyond Goswell-street, near Mount-mill, being some of the remains of the old lines or fortifications of the city, where abundance were buried promiscuously from the parishes of Aldersgate, Clerkenwell, and even out of the city. This ground, as I take it, was first made a physic garden, and after that built upon.

Second.—A piece of ground just over the Black Ditch, as it was then called, at the end of Holloway-lane, in Shoreditch parish : it has been since made a yard for keeping hogs, and for other ordinary uses, but is quite out of use as a burying-ground.

Third.—The upper end of Hand-alley, in Bishopsgate-street, which was then a green field, was taken in particularly for Bishopsgate parish, though many of the carts out of the city brought their dead thither also, particularly out of the parish of St. Allhallows, on the Wall : this place I cannot mention without much regret. It was, as I remember, about two or three years after the Plague had ceased, that Sir Robert Clayton came to be possessed of the ground : it was reported, how true I know not, that it fell to the king for want of heirs, all those who had any right to it being carried off by the pestilence, and that Sir Robert Clayton obtained a grant of it from King Charles II. But however he came by it, certain it is, the ground was let out to build on, or built upon by his order : the first house built upon it was a large fair house, still standing, which faces the street or way now called Hand-alley, which, though called an alley, is as wide as a street. The houses in the same row with that house northward, are built on the very same ground where the poor people were buried, and the bodies, on opening the ground for the foundations, were dug up, some of them remaining so plain to be seen that the women's skulls were distinguished by their long hair, and of others the flesh was not quite perished; so that the people began to exclaim loudly against it, and some suggested that it might endanger a return of the contagion. After this, the bones and bodies, as fast as they came at them, were carried to another part of the same ground, and thrown altogether into a deep pit dug on purpose, which now is to be known, in that it is not built on, but is a passage to another house at the upper end of Rose-alley, just against the door of a meeting-house, which has been built there many years since; and the ground is palisadoed off from the rest of the passage in a little square: there lie the bones and remains of near two thousand bodies, carried by the dead-carts to their grave in that one year.

Fourth.—Besides this, there was a piece of ground in Moorfields, by the going into the street which is now called Old Bethlem, which was enlarged much, though not wholly taken in on the same occasion.

[N.B.—The author of this Journal lies buried in that very ground, being at his own desire, his sister having been buried there a few years before.]

Fifth.—Stepney parish, extending itself from the east part of London to the north, even to the very edge of Shoreditch church-yard, had a piece of ground taken in to bury their dead, close to the said church-yard; and which for that very reason was left open, and is since, I suppose, taken into the same church-yard: and they had also two other burying-places in Spittle-fields; one, where since a chapel or tabernacle has been built for ease to this great parish, and another in Petticoat-lane.

There were no less than five other grounds made use of for the parish of Stepney at that time; one, where now stands the parish church of St. Paul's, Shadwell; and another where now stands the parish church of St. John, at Wapping; both which had not the names of parishes at that time, but were belonging to Stepney parish.*

I could name many more, but these coming within my particular knowledge, that circumstance I thought made it of use to record them. From the whole it may be observed, that they were obliged in this time of distress to take in new burying-grounds in most of the out-parishes, for laying the prodigious numbers of people which died in so short a space of time; but why care was not taken to keep those places separate from ordinary uses, that so the bodies might rest undisturbed, that I cannot answer for, and must confess, I think it was wrong: who were to blame, I know not.

I should have mentioned, that the Quakers had at that time also a burying-ground set apart to their use, and which they still make use of, and they had also a particular dead-cart to fetch their dead from their houses; and the famous Solomon Eagle, who, as I mentioned before, had predicted the Plague as a judgment, and run naked through the streets, (telling the people that it was come upon them, to punish them for their sins,) had his own wife died the very next day of the Plague, and she was carried one of the first in the Quaker's dead-cart to their new burying-ground.

I might have thronged this account with many more remarkable things which occurred in the time of the infection, and particularly of what passed between the Lord Mayor and the court, which was then at Oxford, and what directions were from time to time received from the government for their conduct on this critical occasion. But really the court concerned themselves so little, and that little they did was of so small import, that I do not see it of much moment to mention any part of it here, except that of appointing a monthly fast in the city, and the sending the royal charity to the relief of the poor, both of which I have mentioned before.*

Great was the reproach thrown on those physicians who left their patients during the sickness, and now they came to town again nobody cared to employ them; they were called deserters, and frequently bills were set up upon their doors, and written—"Here is a doctor to be let!"—so that several of those physicians were fain for a while to sit still and look about them; or at least remove their dwellings and set up in new places, and among new acquaintance.† The like was the case with the clergy, who the people were indeed very abusive to, writing verses and scandalous reflections upon them, set-

* The observance of the Monthly Fast is noticed in different numbers of the "Newes" and "Intelligencer." In the former paper, No. 91 (Nov. 7th), is an account of contributions from the town of Derby where many of the Londoners appear to have taken refuge. The Oxford Gazette, No. 10, December 14—18, announced that the King intended to keep his Christmas at Oxford.

† Dr. Hodges made a few remarks on this subject, which it may not be inexpedient to introduce. "Physicians," he says, "could not be blamed for retiring: the disease was not subject to their art. Many learned Physicians retired, not so much for their own preservation as the service of those they attended: those who stayed, the Plague put to their non-plus; in such strange and changeable shapes did the cameleon-like sickness appear! There were Empirics (when all art failed) who pretended to perform wonders; but were supposed to send numbers to heaven who were wished to tarry longer on earth, to be useful in a time of such inexpressible distress." ting upon the church door—"Here is a pulpit to be let!"—or sometimes, "to be sold,"—which was worse.*

It was not the least of our misfortunes, that with our infection, when it ceased, there did not cease the spirit of strife and contention, slander and reproach, which was really the great troubler of the nation's peace before: it was said to be the remains of the old animosities, which had so lately involved us all in blood and disorder. But as the late Act of Indemnity had laid asleep the quarrel itself, so the government had recommended family and personal peace, upon all occasions, to the whole nation.

But it could not be obtained, and particularly after the ceasing of the Plague in London, when any one that had seen the condition which the people had been in, and how they caressed one another at that time, promising to have more charity for the future, and to raise no more reproaches;—I say, any one that had seen them then, would have thought they would have come together with another spirit at last; but, I say, it could not be obtained: the quarrel remained, the Church and the Presbyterians were incompatible. As soon as the Plague was removed, the dissenting ousted ministers, who had supplied the pulpits which were deserted by the incumbents, retired—they could expect no other; but that they should immediately fall upon them, and harass them with their penal laws, accept their preaching while they were sick, and persecute them as soon as they were recovered again;—this even we that were of the Church thought was very hard, and could by no means approve of it.

But it was the government, and we could say nothing to hinder it; we could only say, it was not our doing, and we could not answer for it.

On the other hand, the Dissenters reproaching those ministers of the Church with going away and deserting their charge, abandoning the people in their danger, and that when they had most need of comfort, and the like, this we could by no means approve; for all men have not the same faith and the same courage, and the Scripture commands us to judge the most favourably, and according to charity.

A Plague is a formidable enemy, and is armed with terrors that every man is not sufficiently fortified to resist, nor prepared to stand the shock against. It is very certain, that a great many of the clergy who were in circumstances to do it withdrew, and fled for the safety of their lives; but it is true also, that a great many of them stayed, and many of them fell in the calamity, and in the discharge of their duty.

It is true, some of the dissenting turned-out ministers stayed, and their courage is to be commended and highly valued, but these were not in abundance. It cannot be said that they all stayed, and that none retired into the country, any more than it can be said of the Church clergy, that they all went away; neither did all those that went away go without substituting curates and others in their places, to do the offices needful, and to visit the sick as far as it was practicable; so that upon the whole an allowance of charity might have been made on both sides, and we should have considered that such a time as this of 1665, is not to be paralleled in history, and that it is not the stoutest courage that will always support men in such cases. I had not said this, but had rather chosen to record the courage and religious zeal of those of both sides, who did hazard themselves for the service of the poor people in their distress, without remembering that any failed in their duty on either side; but the want of temper among us has made the contrary to this necessary: some that stayed, not only boasting too much of themselves, but reviling those that fled, branding them with cowardice, deserting their flocks, and acting the part of the hireling, and the like. I recommend it to the charity of all good people to look back and reflect duly upon the terrors of the time, and whoever does so will see that it is not an ordinary strength that could support it; it was not like appearing at the head of an army, or charging a body of horse in the field; but it was charging Death himself on his pale horse. To stay was indeed to die, and it could be esteemed nothing less, especially as things appeared at the latter end of August and the beginning of September, and as there was reason to expect them at that time; for no man expected nor, I dare say, believed, that the distemper would take so sudden a turn as it did, and fall immediately 2000 in a week, when there was such a prodigious number of people sick at that time as it was known there was; and then it was that many shifted away that had stayed most of the time before.

Besides, if God gave strength to some more than to others, was it to boast of their ability to abide the stroke, and upbraid those that had not the same gift and support? or ought not they rather to have been humble and thankful, if they were rendered more useful than their brethren?

I think it ought to be recorded to the honour of such men, as well clergy as physicians, surgeons, apothecaries, magistrates, and officers of every kind, as also all useful people, who ventured their lives in discharge of their duty, as most certainly all such as stayed did, to the last degree; and several of all these kinds did not only venture, but lost their lives on that sad occasion.

I was once making a list of all such, I mean of all those professions and employments who thus died, as I call it, in the way of their duty; but it was impossible for a private man to come at a certainty in the particulars. I only remember, that there died sixteen clergymen, two aldermen, five physicians, and thirteen surgeons, within the city and liberties before the beginning of September: but this being, as I said before, the great crisis and extremity of the infection, it can be no complete list.* As to inferior people, I think there died six-and-forty constables and headboroughs in the two parishes of Stepney and Whitechapel; but I could not carry my list on, for when the violent rage of the distemper in September came upon us, it drove us out of all measures. Men did then no more die by tale and by number; they might put out a weekly bill, and call them seven or eight thousand, or what they pleased; but 'tis certain they died by heaps, and were buried by heaps, that is to say, without account; and if I might believe some people, who were more abroad and more conversant with those things than I, (though I was public enough for one that had no more business to do than I had,) I say, if I may believe them, there were not many less buried those first three weeks in September than 20,000 per week. But however the others aver the truth of this, yet I rather choose to keep to the public account: seven and eight thousand per week is enough to make good all that I have said of the terror of those times; and it is much to the satisfaction of me that write, as well as those that read, to be able to say, that every thing is set down with moderation, and rather within compass than beyond it.

* "In this raging Pestilence," says L'Estrange, in the "Intelligencer," of October 21st (No. 86), "we cannot but look upon it as an earnest of further blessings that it has pleased Almighty God to spare those public Ministers, Magistrates, and Officers upon whose lives the peace and order of the government so much depends; insomuch that I do not find this visitation to have taken away in or about this city any one person of prime authority and command. His Grace the Lord Abp. of Canterbury [Sheldon] hath all this while kept his station, and constantly attended all the duties of his charge and function." The Duke of Albemarle [Monck] is also praised for having kept his post during the Plague.—The gallant Lord Craven, whose history is so closely associated with that of the Electress Elizabeth, and some remnants of whose town residence may yet be found near the lower end of Drury Lane, was one of the few, also, who became deservedly popular from remaining in the metropolis, and supplying the wants of the poor, during the raging of the Plague.

Upon all these accounts I say I could wish, when we were recovered, our conduct had been more distinguished for charity and kindness in remembrance of the past calamity, and not so much in valuing ourselves upon our boldness in staying; as if all men were cowards that flee from the hand of God, or that those who stay, do not sometimes owe their courage to their ignorance, and despising the hand of their Maker, which is a criminal kind of desperation, and not a true courage.

I cannot but leave it upon record, that the civil officers, such as constables, headboroughs, lord mayors and sheriffs' men, as also parish officers, whose business it was to take charge of the poor, did their duties in general with as much courage as any; and perhaps with more, because their work was attended with more hazards, and lay more among the poor, who were more subject to be infected, and in the most pitiful plight when they were taken with the infection; but then it must be added too, that a great number of them died: indeed it was scarce possible it should be otherwise.

I have not said one word here about the physic or preparations that we ordinarily made use of on this terrible occasion; I mean we that went frequently abroad up and down street, as I did. Much of this was talked of in the books and bills of our quack doctors, of whom I have said enough already; it may, however, be added that the college of physicians were daily publishing several preparations, which they had considered of in the process of their practice, and which being to be had in print, I avoid repeating them for that reason.

One thing I could not help observing, what befel one of the quacks, who published that he had a most excellent preservative against the Plague, which whoever kept about them, should never be infected, nor liable to infection; this man, who we may reasonably suppose did not go abroad without some of this excellent preservative in his pocket, yet was taken by the distemper, and carried off in two or three days.

I am not of the number of the physic-haters, or physic-despisers; on the contrary, I have often mentioned the regard I had to the dictates of my particular friend Dr. Heath; but yet I must acknowledge, I made use of little or nothing, except, as I have observed, to keep a preparation of strong scent, to have ready in case I met with anything of offensive smells, or went too near any burying-place, or dead body.

Neither did I do what I know some did, keep the spirits always high and hot with cordials, and wine, and such things; and which, as I observed, one learned physician used himself so much to as that he could not leave them off when the infection was quite gone, and so became a sot for all his life after.

I remember, my friend the doctor used to say, that there was a certain set of drugs and preparations which were all certainly good and useful in the case of an infection; out of which, or with which, physicians might make an infinite variety of medicines, as the ringers of bells make several hundred different rounds of music by the changing and order of sound but in six bells;—and that all these preparations shall be really very good; “therefore,” said he, “I do not wonder that so vast a throng of medicines is offered in the present calamity; and almost every physician prescribes or prepares a different thing, as his judgment or experience guides him: but,” says my friend, “let all the prescriptions of all the physicians in London be examined, and it will be found that they are all compounded of the same things, with such variations only as the particular fancy of the doctor leads him to; so that,” says he, “every man judging a little of his own constitution, and manner of his living, and circumstances of his being infected, may direct his own medicines out of the ordinary drugs and preparations. Some recommend one thing as most sovereign, and some another; some,” says he, “think that pill. Rufi, which is called, itself, the anti-pestilential pill, is the best preparation that can be made;*” others think that Venice

* The Pilulæ Rufi is a composition of Aloes and Myrrh, still retained in the London Pharmacopœia, as a useful aperient medicine, under the name of Pilulæ Aloes cum Myrrhâ. Venice Treacle, which is a cordial confection consisting of many ingredients, including Opium, has been replaced in modern medical practice by the less complicated Confectio Opii.

The following passage, bearing on this subject, is derived from the treacle is sufficient of itself to resist the contagion, and I," continued he, "think as both these think, viz., that the first is good to take beforehand to prevent it, and the last, if touched, to expel it." According to this opinion, I several times took Venice treacle, and a sound sweat upon it, and thought myself as well fortified against the infection as any one could be fortified by the power of physic.

As for quackery and mountebank, of which the town was so full, I listened to none of them, and observed often since, with some wonder, that for two years after the Plague, I scarcely saw or heard of one of them about town. Some fancied they were all swept away in the infection to a man, and were for calling it a particular mark of God's vengeance upon them, for leading the poor people into the pit of destruction, merely for the lucre of a little money they got by them; but I cannot go that length neither: that abundance of them died is certain, many of whom came within the reach of my own knowledge; but that all of them were swept off I much question: I believe rather they fled into the country, and tried their practices upon the people there, who were in apprehension of the infection before it came among them.

Correspondence of Mr. Oldenburgh with the Hon. Robert Boyle, and appears in a Letter dated by the former, from London, on the 18th of September, 1665. Signior Borrhi was an Italian Practitioner of some repute. "Signior Borrhi hath expressed a real favour and kindness to me, which, when he first mentioned it, I looked upon as a mere compliment: for he hath sent me his own Anti-loimoides, so conveniently prepared, that he inclosed it (the medicine itself) in a fine bladder, which he so squared that it was handsomely put up in a letter, and so came safely to my hands; but had that strength of scent that the man who brought me the letter said it must be some rare medicine come from beyond sea, against the Plague. It is made up in the consistency of Mithridate, or Treacle, and hath a very comfortable smell; yet I have not hitherto made use of it, but only tasted as much of it as the bigness of a pin's head, but know not what to make of it. Methinks I find myrrh and aloe, Mithridate and Treacle in it: and I had sent you a pattern of it in this very letter but that I thought you might be so much surprised by the scent thereof."—Boyle's Works, vol. vi. p. 194.

This however is certain, not a man of them appeared for a great while in or about London. There were indeed several doctors, who published bills, recommending their several physical preparations for cleansing the body, as they call it, after the Plague, and needful, as they said, for such people to take, who had been visited and had been cured;—whereas, I must own, I believe that it was the opinion of the most eminent physicians at that time, that the Plague was itself a sufficient purge, and that those who escaped the infection needed no physic to cleanse their bodies of any other things; the running sores, the tumours, &c., which were broken and kept open by the directions of the physicians, having sufficiently cleansed them; and that all other distempers, and causes of distempers, were effectually carried off that way: and as the physicians gave this as their opinion wherever they came, the quacks got little business.

There were, indeed, several little hurries which happened after the decrease of the Plague, and which, whether they were contrived to fright and disorder the people, as some imagined, I cannot say, but sometimes we were told the Plague would return by such a time; and the famous Solomon Eagle, the naked Quaker I have mentioned, prophesied evil tidings every day; and several others told us that London had not been sufficiently scourged, and the sorer and severer strokes were yet behind. Had they stopped there, or had they descended to particulars, and told us that the city should the next year be destroyed by fire, then, indeed, when we had seen it come to pass, we should not have been to blame to have paid more than common respect to their prophetic spirits,—at least, we should have wondered at them, and have been more serious in our inquiries after the meaning of it, and whence they had the foreknowledge; but as they generally told us of a relapse into the Plague, we have had no concern since that about them. Yet, by those frequent clamours, we were all kept with some kind of apprehensions constantly upon us; and if any died suddenly, or if the spotted fevers at any time increased, we were presently alarmed; much more if the number of the Plague increased; for to the end of the year there were always between two and three hundred of the Plague. On any of these occasions, I say, we were alarmed anew.

Those who remember the city of London before the Fire, must remember that there was then no such place as that we now call Newgate Market; but in the middle of the street, which is now called Blow-bladder-street,* and which had its name from the butchers, who used to kill and dress their sheep there, (and who, it seems had a custom to blow up their meat with pipes to make it look thicker and fatter than it was, and were punished there for it by the Lord Mayor,) I say, from the end of the street towards Newgate, there stood two long rows of shambles for the selling meat.

It was in those shambles, that two persons falling down dead, as they were buying meat, gave rise to a rumour that the meat was all infected, which, though it might affright the people, and spoiled the market for two or three days, yet it appeared plainly afterwards, that there was nothing of truth in the suggestion; but nobody can account for the possession of fear when it takes hold of the mind.

However, it pleased God, by the continuing of the * Blow-bladder-street was the old name of the oblique avenue connecting the west-end of Cheapside with Newgate-street, and ending at St. Martin's-le-Grand.

winter weather, so to restore the health of the city, that by February following [1665-6], we reckoned the distemper quite ceased, and then we were not so easily frightened again.*

There was still a question among the learned, and which at first perplexed the people a little,—and that was in what manner to purge the houses and goods where the Plague had been, and how to render them habitable again, which had been left empty during the time of the Plague. Abundance of perfumes and preparations were prescribed by physicians, some of one kind and some of another, in which the people who listened to them put themselves to a great, and indeed, in my opinion, to an unnecessary expense; and the poorer people, who only set open their windows night and day, burnt brimstone, pitch, and gunpowder, and such things in their rooms, did as well as the best; nay, the eager people, who, as I said above, came home in haste, and at all hazards, found little or no inconvenience in their houses, nor in their goods, and did little or nothing to them.

However, in general, prudent cautious people did enter into some measures for airing and sweetening their houses, and burnt perfumes, incense, benjamin, resin, and sulphur, in their rooms close shut up, and then let the air carry it all out with a blast of gunpowder. Others caused large fires to be made all day and all night, for several days and nights; by the same token that two or three were pleased to set their houses on fire, and so effectually sweetened them by burning them down to the ground; as particularly one at Ratcliff, one in Holborn, and one at Westminster, besides two or three that were set on fire; but the fire was happily got out again before it went far enough to burn down the houses; and one citizen's servant, I think it was in Thames-street, carried so much gunpowder into his master's house, for clearing it of the infection, and managed it so foolishly, that he blew up part of the roof of the house. But the time was not fully come that the city was to be purged with fire; nor was it far off, for within nine months more I saw it all lying in ashes; when, as some of our quacking philosophers pretend, the seeds of the Plague were entirely destroyed, and not before;—a notion too ridiculous to speak of here, since, had the seeds of the Plague remained in the houses, not to be destroyed but by fire, how has it been that they have not since broken out? Seeing that all those buildings in the suburbs and liberties, all in the great parishes of Stepney, Whitechapel, Aldgate, Bishopsgate, Shore-ditch, Cripplegate, and St. Giles, where the fire never came, and where the Plague raged with the greatest violence, remain still in the same condition they were in before.

But to leave these things just as I found them, it was certain that those people who were more than ordinarily cautious of their health, did take particular directions for what they called seasoning of their houses, and abundance of costly things were consumed on that account; which I cannot but say, not only seasoned those houses, as they desired, but filled the air with very grateful and wholesome smells, which others had the share of the benefit of, as well as those who were at the expenses of them.

And yet after all, though the poor came to town very precipitantly, as I have said, yet I must say the rich made no such haste; the men of business indeed, came up, but many of them did not bring their families to town till the spring came on, and that they saw reason to depend upon it, that the Plague would not return.

The court, indeed, came up soon after Christmas, but the nobility and gentry, except such as depended upon, and had employment under, the administration, did not come so soon.*

I should have taken notice here that, notwithstanding the violence of the Plague in London and in other places, yet it was very observable that it was never on board the Fleet; † and yet, for some time, there was a strange press

* Lord Clarendon (in the "Continuation" of his "Life," before referred to, p. 326,) states that the King came from Oxford to Hampton Court "towards the end of February;" and then, with his customary incorrectness, he says, "the next week after his Majesty came thither, the number of those who died of the Plague in the City decreased a thousand,"—"and after a fortnight, or three weeks stay there, he resolved to go to Whitehall, when there died about fifteen hundred in the week, and when there was not in a day seen a coach in the streets, but those which came in his Majesty's train!" We learn, however, from the Bills of Mortality, that during the first three months of the year 1666, there was a single week only (in January) when the number of deaths of all diseases, amounted to so many as three hundred.—Again (in respect to the king's arrival), Pepys says, under the date of January the 31st,—"To Whitehall, and to my great joy, people begin to bustle up and down there, the king holding his resolution to be in town to-morrow, and hath good encouragement, blessed be God! to do so, the Plague being decreased this week to 56, and the total to 227." On the 2nd of February he wrote:—"My Lord Sandwich is come to town with the king and duke." It is probable, that the king resided at Hampton Court during a fortnight or so, afterwards; but the Court was very soon re-established at Whitehall: the Queen and her ladies were all there, as Pepys informs us, on the 18th of February.

The confidence of the people increased with the return of the Court, and the town, as Lord Clarendon states with more truth than before, "every day filled marvellously. So that before the end of March, the streets were as full, the Exchange as much crowded, and the people in all places as numerous, as they had ever been seen, few persons missing any of their acquaintance when they returned, not many of wealth or quality or of much conversation being dead; yet some of either sort there were."

† In the Harleian Library is a copy of an Order of a Court Martial, inhibiting all inferior officers of the Fleet to permit their men to go ashore, or to press men from the Colliers returning from London, for fear of the Plague. in the river, and even in the streets, for seamen to man the Fleet; but that was in the beginning of the year, when the Plague was scarce begun, and not at all come down to that part of the city where they usually press for seamen; and though a war with the Dutch was not at all grateful to the people at that time, and the seamen went with a kind of reluctancy into the service, and many complained of being dragged into it by force, yet it proved in the event a happy violence to several of them, who had probably perished in the general calamity, and who, after the summer service was over, though they had cause to lament the desolation of their families, of whom, when they came back, many were in their graves; yet they had room to be thankful that they themselves were carried out of the reach of it, though so much against their wills. We indeed had a hot war with the Dutch that year, and one very great engagement at sea, in which the Dutch were worsted; but we lost a great many men and some ships. But, as I observed, the Plague was not in the Fleet, and when they came to lay up the ships in the river, the violent part of it began to abate.

I would be glad if I could close the account of this melancholy year with some particular examples historically; I mean of the thankfulness to God our Preserver, for our being delivered from this dreadful calamity. Certainly, the circumstances of the deliverance, as well as the terrible enemy we were delivered from, called upon the whole nation for it: the circumstances of the deliverance were indeed very remarkable, as I have in part mentioned already, and particularly the dreadful condition which we were all in when we were, to the surprise of the whole town, made joyful with the hope of a stop of the infection.

Omnipotent Power, could have done it! The contagion despised all medicine, Death raged in every corner; and had it gone on as it did then, a few weeks more would have cleared the town of all, and every thing that had a soul. Men everywhere began to despair; every heart failed them for fear; people were made desperate through the anguish of their souls; and the terrors of Death sat in the very faces and countenances of the people.

In that very moment, when we might very well say—“Vain was the help of man!”—I say, in that very moment, it pleased God, with a most agreeable surprise, to cause the fury of it to abate, even of itself, and the malignity declining, as I have said, though infinite numbers were sick, yet fewer died; and the very first week's bill decreased one thousand eight hundred and forty-three—a vast number indeed!

It is impossible to express the change that appeared in the very countenances of the people that Thursday morning, when the weekly bill came out: it might have been perceived in their countenances that a secret surprise and smile of joy sat on everybody's face; they shook one another by the hands in the streets, who would hardly go on the same side of the way with one another before! Where the streets were not too broad, they would open their windows and call from one house to another, and ask “how they did,” and if they “had heard the good news that the plague was abated.” Some would return, when they said, “good news,” and ask, “What good news?”—and when they answered that the plague was abated, and the bills decreased almost 2000, they would cry out, “GOD BE PRAISED!” and would weep aloud for joy, telling them they had heard nothing of it. And such was the joy of the people, that it was, as it were, life to them from the grave. I could almost set down as many extravagant things done in the excess of their joy, as of their grief; but that would be to lessen the value of it.

I must confess myself to have been very much dejected just before this happened; for the prodigious number that was taken sick the week or two before, besides those that died, was such, and the lamentations were so great everywhere, that a man must have seemed to have acted even against his reason, if he had so much as expected to escape: and as there was hardly a house but mine in all my neighbourhood but what was infected; so, had it gone on, it would not have been long that there would have been any more neighbours to be infected. Indeed, it is hardly credible what dreadful havoc the last three weeks had made; for, if I might believe the person whose calculations I always found very well grounded, there were not less than 30,000 people dead, and near 100,000 fallen sick in the three weeks I speak of; for the number that sickened was surprising:—indeed it was astonishing, and those whose courage upheld them all the time before, sunk under it now.

In the middle of their distress, when the condition of the city of London was so truly calamitous, just then it pleased God, as it were by his immediate hand, to disarm this enemy; the poison was taken out of the sting: it was wonderful! Even the physicians themselves were surprised at it: wherever they visited, they found their patients better, either they had sweated kindly, or the tumours were broke, or the carbuncles went down, and the inflammations round them changed colour, or the fever was gone, or the violent headache was assuaged, or some good symptom was in the case; so that in a few days everybody was recovering: whole families that were infected and down, that had ministers praying with them, and expected death every hour, were revived and healed, and none died at all out of them.

Nor was this by any new medicine found out, or new method of cure discovered, or by any experience in the operation, which the physicians or surgeons attained to; but it was evidently from the secret invisible hand of HIM that had at first sent this disease as a judgment upon us: and let the atheistic part of mankind call my saying what they please, it is no enthusiasm. It was acknowledged at that time by all mankind. The disease was enervated, and its malignity spent, and let it proceed from whence-soever it will, let the philosophers search for reasons in nature to account for it by, and labour as much as they will to lessen the debt they owe to their Maker; those physicians who had the least share of religion in them, were obliged to acknowledge that it was all supernatural, that it was extraordinary, and that no account could be given of it!

If I should say, that this is a visible summons to us all to thankfulness, especially we that were under the terror of its increase, perhaps it may be thought by some, after the sense of the thing was over, an officious canting of religious things, preaching a sermon instead of writing a history; making myself a teacher instead of giving my observations of things: and this restrains me very much from going on here, as I might otherwise do;—but if ten lepers were healed, and but one returned to give thanks, I desire to be as that one, and to be thankful for myself.*

* This allusion refers to St. Luke's Gospel, chap. xvii. verses 12—19. "And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back, and with a loud voice glorified God!—And Jesus said, 'Were there not ten cleansed? but where are the nine?'"

Nor will I deny but there were abundance of people, who, to all appearance, were very thankful at that time; for their mouths were stopped, even the mouths of those whose hearts were not extraordinary long affected with it. But the impression was so strong at that time, that it could not be resisted,—no, not by the worst of the people.

It was a common thing to meet people in the street that were strangers, and that we knew nothing at all of, expressing their surprise. Going one day through Aldgate, and a pretty many people being passing and repassing, there comes a man out of the end of the Minories, and looking a little up the street and down, he throws his hands abroad,—“Lord, what an alteration is here! Why, last week I came along here, and hardly anybody was to be seen:” another man, I heard him, adds to his words, “’Tis all wonderful, ’tis all a dream.”—“Blessed be God,” says a third man, “and let us give thanks to Him, for ’tis all His own doing. Human help and human skill was at an end.” These were all strangers to one another: but such salutations as these were frequent in the street every day; and in spite of a loose behaviour, the very common people went along the streets, giving God thanks for their deliverance.

It was now, as I said before, the people had cast off all apprehensions, and that too fast; indeed we were no more afraid now to pass by a man with a white cap upon his head, or with a cloth wrapped round his neck, or with his leg limping, occasioned by the sores in his groin, all which were frightful to the last degree, but the week before; but now the street was full of them, and these poor recovering creatures, give them their due, appeared very sensible of their unexpected deliverance; and I should wrong them very much, if I should not acknowledge, that I believe many of them were really thankful; but I must own, that for the generality of the people it might too justly be said of them, as was said of the children of Israel, after their being delivered from the host of Pharaoh, when they passed the Red Sea, and looked back, and saw the Egyptians overwhelmed in the water, viz., that “They sang his praise, but they soon forgot his works.”

I can go no further here :—I should be counted censorious, and perhaps unjust, if I should enter into the unpleasing work of reflecting, whatever cause there was for it, upon the unthankfulness and return of all manner of wickedness among us, which I was so much an eye-witness of myself.—I shall conclude the account of this calamitous year, therefore, with a coarse but sincere stanza of my own, which I placed at the end of my ordinary memorandums, the same year they were written :—

A dreadful Plague in London was
In the year sixty-five,
Which swept an hundred thousand souls
Away—yet I alive.

ACCOUNT OF THE GREAT PLAGUE OF 1665,

FROM

A MANUSCRIPT WRITTEN BY MR. WILLIAM BOGHURST.

No. 1.

AMONG THE MANUSCRIPTS formerly in the collection of Sir Hans Sloane, but now preserved in the British Museum, is a Treatise on the Plague, as it appeared in London in 1665. It was drawn up by Mr. WILLIAM BOGHURST, a medical practitioner, who resided in the metropolis during the whole period of the prevalence of the disease, and contains the result of his personal observations, for making which he appears to have had abundant opportunities. That he was a man of some learning and ability may be concluded from his work, which is a thin quarto (containing 170 pages, and divided into chapters), fairly written as if prepared for the press; although no part of it has hitherto been published, except a few extracts in a monthly journal in 1831. The greater portion of the work, relating to the medical treatment of the disease, is now become obsolete, and no longer interesting even to professional readers; but the facts and remarks which it contains are still deserving of notice;—and the more so, perhaps, on account of their immediate connexion with the events recorded in the preceding “Journal of the Plagué Year.” These are chiefly, if not entirely, comprised in the ensuing passages; the arrangement of which has been somewhat altered from the order in which they appear in the manuscript, for the purpose of better connecting the subjects. The work is thus intituled:—

“Λοιμογραφία: or an Experimental Relation of the Plague, of what hath happened Remarqueable in the last Plague in the City of London: demonstrating its Generation, Progress, fore-running and subsequent Diseases and Accidents, Common Signes, good and evill, Meanes of Preservation, Method of Cure, generall and particular, with a Collection of choice and tried Medicines for Preservation and Cure, by the practicall Experience and Observation of William Boghurst, Apothecary in St. Giles’s in the Fields. London, 1666.”

In an address To the Reader. Mr. Boghurst says the Plague continued “eighteen months, viz. ffrom the ijd of November, 1664, to the latter end of this May last past, 1666:” and he remarks, that he was the only person who had then written on the late Plague, from experience and observation.

Among the “Signes fore-shewing a Plague coming,” he enumerates that of “Birds, wild-fowl, and wild beasts, leaving their accustomed places: few swallowes were scene in the yeares 1664 and 65.”

“In the summer before the Plague, (in 1664,) there was such a multitude of flies that they lined the insides of houses: and if any threads or strings did hang down in any place, they were presently thick set with flies like ropes of onions; and swarms of ants covered the highways, that you might have taken up a handful at a time, both winged and creeping ants; and such a multitude of croaking frogs in ditches, that you might have heard them before you saw them.—Also, the same summer, the small-pox was so rife in our parish, that betwixt the Church and the Pound in St. Giles’s, which is not above six score paces, about forty families had the small-pox.”

“The Plague hath put itselfe forth in St. Gyles, St. Clements, St. Paul’s, Covent Garden, and St. Martin’s, this 3 or 4 years, as I have been certainly informed by the people themselves that had it in their houses in these Parishes.”

Speaking of the “Evil Signs or Presages of the Plague,” the writer notices the general symptoms of the disease at some length:—"Among these were spots of different colours, hiccough, vomiting, carbuncles or buboes, shortness of breath, and stoppage of urine, drowsiness and thirstiness, contraction of the jaws, and large and extended tumours."

"This Plague was ushered in with seven months dry weather and westerly winds. It fell first upon the highest grounds; for our parish (viz. St. Giles's) is the highest ground about London, and the best air, yet was first infected. Highgate, Hampstead, and Acton, also, all shared in it."

"The wind blowing westward so long together, (from before Christmas until July,) was the cause the Plague began first at the west end of the City, as at St. Giles's, and St. Martin's, Westminster. Afterwards, it gradually insinuated and crept down Holborn and the Strand, and then into the City, and at last to the east end of the suburbs: so that it was half a year at the west end of the City before the east end and Stepney were infected, which was about the middle of July. Southwark, being the south suburb, was infected almost as soon as the west end."

"The disease spread not altogether by contagion at first, nor began only at one place, and spread farther and farther, as an eating and spreading sore doth all over the body; but fell upon several places of the City and suburbs like rain, even at the first,—as St. Giles's, St. Martin's, Chancery Lane, Southwark, Houndsditch, and some places within the City, as at Proctors' Houses."

"Almost all that caught the disease with fear, died with tokens in two or three days. About the beginning, most men got the disease with fuddling, surfeiting, over-heating themselves, and by disorderly living."

"The Plague is a most acute disease, for though some dyed 8, 10, 12, or 20 dayes after they had been sicke, yet the greatest part dyed before 5 or 6 dayes, and in the summer about half that were sicke dyed, but towards winter, 3 parts in 4 lived; but none dyed suddenly, as tho' stricken with lightning, or an apoplexy, as authors write in several countries, and Diemerbroek seemes to believe; but I saw none dye under 20 or 24 hours."

"Tokens appeared not much till about the middle of June, and carbuncles, not till the latter end of July, but were very rife in the fall, about September and October, and seized most on old people, adust, choleric, and melancholy people, and generally on dry and lean bodies; children had none. If very hot weather followed a shower of rain, the disease increased."

"Many people, after a violent sweat, or taking a strong cordial, presently had the tokens come out, so that every nurse could say 'cochineal was a fine thing to bring out the tokens.'"

"Authors speak of several kinds of Plagues, which took only children, others maids, others young people under thirty; but this of ours took all sorts: yet it fell not very thicke upon old people till about the middle or slack of the disease, and most in the decrease and declining of the disease.—Old people that had the disease, many of them were not sick at all; but they that were sick almost all died. I had one patient four-score and six years old."

"Though all sorts of people dyed very thicke, both young and old, rich and poore, healthy and unhealthy, strong and weake, men and women, of all constitutions, of all tempers and complexions, of all professions and places, of all religions, of all conditions, good and bad: yet as far as I could discern the difference of the two, more of the good dyed than of the bad, more men than women, and more of dull complexions than the faire."

"Strength of constitution of body was no protection against the disease nor death, for it made the hottest assault upon strong bodies, and determined soonest, for they dyed sooner than people of weaker constitutions, and men dyed sooner than women. All that I saw that were let blood in the disease, if they had been sick two, three, four, five days, or more, died the same day.

“Those that married in the heat of this disease (if they had not had it before), almost all fell into it in a week or a fortnight after, both in city and country, of which most died, especially the men.

“Teeming women fared miserably in the disease; not that they were more subject to catch the disease than others, but when they had it, scarce one in forty lived. Many women giving suck freed themselves of the Plague by their children sucking it from them; but some continued well for some days, sometimes weeks, and then fell into the disease after their children were dead.”

“Black men of thin and lean constitutions were heavy laden with this disease and died, all that I saw, in two or three days; and most of them thick with black tokens. People of the best complexions and merry dispositions had least of the disease; and if they had it fared the best under it.”

“One friend growing melancholy for another was one main cause of its going through a family, especially when they were shut up, which bred a sad apprehension and consternation on their spirits; especially being shut up in dark cellars.” —“As soon as any house is infected, all the sound people should be had out of it, and not shut up therein to be murdered!”

“Of all the common hackney prostitutes of Lutener’s Lane, Dog Yard, Cross Lane, Baldwin’s Gardens, Hatton Garden, and other places, the common criers of oranges, oysters, fruit, &c.; all the impudent, drunken, drabbing bayles and fellows, and many others of the Rouge Route, there are but few missing.”

“Those that dye of the Plague, dye a very easy death generally: first, because it was speedy; secondly, because they died without convulsions. They did but of a sudden fetch their breath a little thick and short, and were presently gone,—just as you squeeze wind out of a bladder. So that I have heard some say, ‘How much am I bound to God, who takes me away by such an easy death!' And commonly they say they are not sicke when death is just at hand, and talke familiarly with you when they are ready to dye, and expect no other themselves."

"This year in which the Plague hath raged so much, no alteration nor change appeared in any element, vegetable, or animal, besides the body of man, except only the season of the year and the winds; the Spring being continual dry for six or seven months together, there being no rain at all but a little sprinkling shower or two about the latter end of April, which caused such a pitiful crop of hay in the Spring: in the Autumn there was a pretty good crop; but all other things kept their common integrity, and all sorts of fruit, as apples, pears, cherries, plums, grapes, melons, cucumbers, pumpions, cabbage, mulberries, raspberries, strawberries: all roots, as parsneps, carrots, turnips; all flowers, all medicinal simples, &c., were as plentiful, large, fair, and wholesome, and all grain as plentiful and good as ever. All kine, cattle, horses, sheep, swine, dogs, wild beasts and tame, as healthful, strong to labour, and wholesome to eat, as ever they were in any year; though many peddling writers have undertaken to find fault with all these things."—"Cats, dogs, oxen, horses, sheep, hogs, conies, all wild beasts; hens, geese, pigeons, turkeys, &c., and all wild fowl, were free from infection."

"Though at first I was much baffled in giving judgment, yet afterwards by use and long observation of the particulars I arrived at a greater skill; for I rendered myself familiar with the disease, knowing that the means to do any good must be not to be fearful: wherefore, I commonly dressed forty sores in a day, held the pulse of patients sweating in their beds half a quarter of an hour together, let blood, administered clysters to the sick, held them up in their beds to keep them from strangling and choaking, half an hour together commonly, and suffered their breathing in my face several times when they were dying; eat and drank with them, especially those that had sores ; sat down by their bed-sides and upon their beds, discoursing with them an hour together. If I had time I stayed by them to see them die, and see the manner of their death, and closed up their mouth and eyes,; for they died with their mouth and eyes very much open and staring. Then if people had nobody to help them (for help was scarce at such a time and place), I helped to lay them forth out of the bed, and afterwards into the coffin; and last of all, accompanied them to the ground."

Speaking of the symptoms of the Plague, Mr. Boghurst notices a great thirst, with a sense of suffocation, and weight on the chest—"almost like those who are troubled with the night mare. I remember," he says, "but one patient that lived under any degree of it, and she lived indeed beyond expectation, for she stammered so that you could not understand what she said, with a very great stoppage and oppression at the breast, and other evill signes. I caused her to try a conclusion which came into my head, viz., I made her lay a great mastive puppy dogge upon her breast two or three hours together, and made her drink Dill, Pennyroyal, and Anniseed, boyld in posset-drink, and sometimes Anniseed-water, for she was a fat woman and would bear it; and by degrees all her stopping and lisping left her, and she crept up again, and is very well at this day."

In the chapter on "Prophylactics, or preservative means," Mr. Boghurst, in reference to precautions used with regard to letters, says—"Some would sift them in a sieve, some wash them first in water, and then dry them at the fire; some air them at the top of a house, a hedge, or a pole, two or three days before they opened them; some would lay them between two cold stones two or three days; some set them before the fire like a toast. Some would not receive them but on a long pole: a countryman delivered one thus to my wife, at the shop door, because he would not venture near her."

“People in the country were so apprehensive of danger from every thing coming from London, that they kept watch and ward as if they would have kept the wind out of towns; forcing some to lie and die in ditches and under hedges and trees, and to lie unburied for a prey to dogs and fowls of the air. At Gloucester, the Mayor of the city, being an apothecary, would not suffer pipes of wine to be brought into the city that came from London; but being brought in, would have had them drawn through the river to wash off the infection; but at last it was agreed they should be excused by pouring water on them: so the vintner’s man took a dish of water and poured on them, and sprinkled each vessel a little, and so made them wholesome, notwithstanding they had come a hundred miles in the air, and it had rained on them much by the way.”

“Great doubting and disputing there is in the world, whether the Plague be infectious or catching or not; because some think if it were infectious it would infect all, as the fire heats, and heats all it comes near; but the Plague leaves as many as it takes: thus they are gravelled at such arguments, and cannot solve their doubts; and Van Helmont thinks all people catch by fear; and generally every one is apt to judge by his own experience, for if they have been in never so little danger and yet have escaped without catching it, they presently think the disease not infectious. And if any one may draw his conclusion from this, I have as much reason almost as any to think it is not infectious, having passed through a multitude of continual dangers, cum summo vite periculo, being employed every day till ten o’clock at night, out of one house into another, dressing sores, and being always in the breath and sweat of patients, without catching the disease of any, through God’s protection; and so did many nurses that were in the like danger. Yet I count it to be the most subtle, infectious disease of any, and that all catch it not by fear neither (though this doth much, as Helmont thinks), for then children and confident people would not have the disease; but we see many of them also have it, and children especially most of any."*

"The summer following the Plague, very few flies, frogs, and such like, appeared.

"The Plague generally begins at the west and the south-west parts of towns and cities, commencing in little, low, poor houses."

Independently of the above treatise, Mr. Boghurst was the author of an English poem entitled "Londiwologia, sive Londini Encomium: The Antiquities and Excellencies of London,"—which is preserved in MS. in the British Museum. See Ayscough's Cat. of MSS. No. 908, fol. 72—84. From a notice appended to those verses, it appears that Mr. Boghurst was a native of Ditton, in Kent, and that he died September 2nd, 1685, aged 54: and was conveyed from London, and buried in the churchyard at Ditton, in accordance with his own directions.

* The account which Mr. Boghurst gives of the extent of his practice in the Plague is somewhat corroborated by the following advertisement, which has been copied from the "Intelligencer" newspaper (No. 59), for the 31st of July, 1665.

"Whereas, Wm. Boghurst, Apothecary, at the White Hart in St. Giles's in the Fields, hath administered a long time to such as have been infected with the Plague, to the number of 40, 50, or 60 patients a day, with wonderful success, by God's blessing upon certain excellent medicines which he hath, as a Water, a Lozenge, &c. Also an Elettuary Antidote, of but 8*d.* the oz. price. This is to notify that the said Boghurst is willing to attend any person infected and desiring his attendance, either in City, Suburbs, or Country, upon reasonable terms, and that the remedies above mentioned are to be had at his house, or shop, at the White Hart aforesaid.

THE LORD MAYOR'S PROCLAMATION.

London, Sept. 2 [1665].

BY THE MAYOR.

WHEREAS it hath pleased God to visit us with a sad and sore Judgment, which yet remaineth increasing and heavy upon us; and it being well pleasing to Almighty God, that all lawful means be used for preventing the spreading thereof, his extraordinary Blessing oftentimes attending thereupon; amongst those outward means that may be used, that of Fire having been found very successful, as by the experience of former ages, and of later days in other countries, as also being generally approved of by all judicious persons, to be a potent and effectual means of correcting and purifying the air: It is therefore agreed upon by and with the advice of his Grace the Duke of Albemarle, and the Aldermen, my Brethren, That all persons whatsoever, inhabiting the City of London and Liberties thereof, be required, as they tender their own welfares, effectually to put in execution such directions as hereafter are expressed. Wherefore all persons, inhabiting as aforesaid are hereby in his Majesty's name, straightly charged and commanded to furnish themselves with sufficient quantities of firing, to wit, of Sea-coal, or any other combustible matter, to maintain and continue Fire burning constantly for three whole Days, and three whole Nights: and in the mean time all extraordinary concourse of People, and employment of Carrs, and whatever else may be troublesome in the Streets, is to be forborne. And fervent prayers to be offered up to the Throne of Grace, for a Blessing upon the means. Every six houses on each side the way, which will be twelve houses, are to joyn together to provide firing for three whole Nights and three whole Days, to be made in one great Fire before the door of the middlemost Inhabitant; and one or more persons to be appointed to keep the Fire constantly burning, without suffering the same to be extinguished or go out all the time aforesaid; and this to be observed in all Streets, Courts, Lanes, and Alleys; and great care to be taken where the Streets, Courts, Lanes, and Alleys are narrow, that the Fires may be made of proportionable bigness, that so no damage may ensue to the Houses. It is supposed that one Load of Sea-coal will maintain a fire for three days and three nights, by first kindling two Bushels, and afterwards a Bushel at a time laid on to continue the fire, whereby six bushels will maintain fire for twenty-four hours, and consequently eighteen Bushels (which is a Load) will be sufficient for three Days and three Nights, which will not amount to above eighteence or two shillings for each House, the three whole Days and Nights; toward which charge all the Inhabitants that pay two-pence a week to the Poor, and upwards, are to be charged with a certain Tax, if they will not furnish the money voluntarily. And that none may avoid their share of this so necessary a charge, by their absence out of town, the Deputies, Common Councilmen, and Church-wardens of each Parish are required to disburse the money; and the Justices will take care that a certain Rate be imposed upon such as are absent, or shall refuse to do it voluntarily, for the repayment of those that shall disburse any money. The Ministers of every Parish are desired to exhort the people to be forward in so hopeful a means, if God shall please to grant his Blessing thereupon. And that notice be given, that upon Tuesday the fifth of September, at eight of the clock at night, the Fires are to be kindled in all Streets, Courts, Lanes, and Alleys, of the City and Suburbs thereof; and all officers whatsoever of the several Wards and Parishes, as also the several Inhabitants, are to take special care for the punctual performance hereof, as they will answer their neglect at their utmost peril.

SIR JOHN LAWRENCE was Lord Mayor at the time of issuing the above Proclamation; and he was succeeded in the Mayoralty, on the 30th of September, by SIR THOMAS BLUDWORTH; the memorable personage to whose incapacity and want of moral courage at the commencement of the Great Fire of 1666, the writers of the time have attributed the extensive spreading of that conflagration.

OPINION OF DR. HODGES ON THE VIRTUES OF SACK.

DE FOE, in the latter part of his "Memoirs," (vide p. 314, of this edition,) has noticed the case of a physician whose constant use of remedial cordials occasioned him to become a confirmed sot. Most probably the person meant was Dr. Hodges, the author of "Loimologia," from whose work De Foe derived so much of his information, and who, from pecuniary embarrassments, became a prisoner in Ludgate, and died in confinement. Like Sir John Falstaff, the doctor found great virtue in sack; and he has thus stated his high opinion of its excellence in the account of his method of practice during the contagion.

“But before I proceed further, gratitude obliges me to do justice to the virtues of sack, as it deservedly is ranked amongst the principal antidotes, whether it be drunk by itself or impregnated with wormwood, angelica, &c., for I have never yet met with anything so agreeable to the nerves and spirits in all my experience. That which is best is middle-aged, neat, fine, bright, racy, and of a walnut flavour; and it is certainly true that during the late fatal times both the infected and the well found vast benefit from it, unless they who used it too intemperately: many indeed medicated it with various alexipharmic simples.”

Again, in noticing tobacco as a prophylactic, Dr. Hodges says,—“I must confess at uncertainties about it; though as to myself, I am its professed enemy, and was accustomed to supply its place as an antidote with sack.” He next mentions amulets as worn against infection; and, after characterising them as baubles, proceeds to give directions “more conformable to reason and the rules of medicine,” concluding his discourse with the subjoined account of his own practice.

“I think it not amiss to recite the means which I used to preserve myself from the infection, during the continual course of my business among the sick.

“As soon as I rose in the morning early, I took the quantity of a nutmeg of the anti-pestilential electuary; then after the despatch of private concerns in my family, I ventured into a large room where crowds of citizens used to be waiting for me; and there I commonly spent two or three hours, as in an hospital, examining the several conditions and circumstances of all who came thither; some of which had ulcers yet uncured, and others came to be advised under the first symptoms of seizure; all which I endeavoured to despatch with all possible care to their various exigencies.

“As soon as this crowd could be discharged, I judged it not proper to go abroad fasting, and therefore got my breakfast. After which, till dinner-time, I visited the sick at their houses, where, upon entering their houses, I immediately had burnt some proper thing upon coals, and also kept in my mouth some lozenges all the while I was examining them. But they are in a mistake who report that physicians used on such occasions very hot things; as myrrh, zedoary, angelica, ginger, &c., for many, deceived thereby, raised inflammation upon their tonsils, and greatly endangered their lungs.

“I further took care not to go into the rooms of the sick when I sweated, or were short-breathed with walking; and kept my mind as composed as possible, being sufficiently warned by such, who had grievously suffered by uneasiness in that respect. After some hours’ visiting in this manner I returned home.

“Before dinner I always drank a glass of sack to warm the stomach, refresh the spirits, and dissipate any beginning lodgment of the infection. I chose meats for my table that yielded an easy and generous nourishment, roasted before boiled, and pickles not only suitable to the meats, but to the nature of the distemper; and indeed in this melancholy time, the city greatly abounded with variety of all good things of that nature. I seldom likewise rose from dinner without drinking more wine. After this I had always many persons come for advice; and as soon as I could despatch them, I again visited till eight or nine at night, and then concluded the evening at home, by drinking to cheerfulness of my old favourite liquor, which encouraged sleep and an easy breathing through the pores all night. But if, in the day time, I found the least approaches of the infection upon me, as by giddiness, loathing at stomach, and faintness, I immediately had recourse to a glass of this wine, which easily drove these beginning disorders away by transpiration. In the whole course of the infection I found myself ill but twice; but was soon again cleared of its approaches by these means, and by the help of such antidotes as I kept always by me.”

THE BAG-PIPER IN TOTTENHAM-COURT ROAD.

THE following traditionary anecdote, which has an immediate reference to De Foe's story of the blind piper, is derived from the London Magazine for April, 1820: it was addressed to the editor by a correspondent; but the original source of the information has not been ascertained.

"I forward you a rather remarkable anecdote relative to a statue, the original work of the famous Caius Gabriel Cibber, which has, for many years, occupied a site in a garden on the terrace in Tottenham-Court Road.

"The statue in question is executed in a fine free-stone, representing a bag-piper in a sitting posture, with his dog and keg of liquor by his side; the latter of which stands upon a neat stone pedestal.—The following singular history is attached to its original execution:—

"During the Great Plague of London, carts were sent round the city each night, the drivers of which rung a bell, as intimation for every house to bring out its dead. The bodies were then thrown promiscuously into the cart, and conveyed to a little distance in the environs, where deep ditches were dug, into which they were deposited.

"The piper (as represented in the statue) had his constant stand at the bottom of Holborn, near St. Andrew's church. He became well known about the neighbourhood, and picked up a living from the passengers going that way, who generally threw him a few pence as the reward of his musical talent. A certain gentleman, who never failed in his generosity to the piper, was surprised, on passing one day as usual, to miss him from his accustomed place: on inquiry, he found that the poor man had been taken ill, in consequence of a very singular accident.—On the joyful occasion of the arrival of one of his countrymen from the Highlands, the piper had made too free with the contents of his keg: these so overpowered his faculties that he stretched himself out upon the steps of the church, and fell fast asleep. Those were not times to sleep on church steps with impunity. He was found in that situation when the dead-cart went its round; and the carter, supposing of course, as the most likely thing in every way, that the man was dead, made no scruple to put his fork under the piper's belt, and, with some assistance, hoisted him into his vehicle, which was nearly full, with the charitable intention that our Scotch musician should share the usual brief ceremonies of interment. The piper's faithful dog protested against this seizure of his master, and attempted to prevent the unceremonious removal; but failing of success, he fairly jumped into the cart after him, to the no small annoyance of the men, whom he would not suffer to come near the body: he further took upon himself the office of chief mourner, by setting up the most lamentable howling as they passed along.

“The streets and roads by which they had to go being very rough, the jolting of the cart, added to the howling of the dog, had soon the effect of awakening our drunken musician from his trance. It was dark, and the piper, when he first recovered himself, could form no idea either of his numerous companions or of his conductors. Instinctively, however, he felt about for his pipes, and playing up a merry Scotch tune, terrified, in no small measure, the carters, who fancied they had got a legion of ghosts in their conveyance. A little time, however, put all to rights;—lights were got; and it turned out that the noisy corpse was the well-known living piper, who was joyfully released from his awful and perilous situation. The poor man fell bodily ill after this unpleasant excursion; and was relieved, during his malady, by his former benefactor, who, to perpetuate the remembrance of so wonderful an escape, resolved, as soon as his patient had recovered, to employ a sculptor to execute him in stone,—not omitting his faithful dog, keg of liquor, and other appurtenances.

“The famous Caius Gabriel Cibber (father to Colley Cibber, the comedian) was then in high repute, from the circumstance of his having executed the beautiful figures which originally were placed over the entrance gate of Old Bethlem Hospital; and the statue in question of the Highland Bag-piper remains an additional specimen of the merits of this great artist.

The little garden mentioned in the preceding extract was nearly opposite to Howland-street; but some years ago a small shop, afterwards occupied as a toy-shop, was built upon it, in front of the house distinguished as No. 178, Tottenham-Court Road. The statue was removed and sold.

SOME ACCOUNT
THE GREAT AND TERRIBLE
FIRE OF LONDON,
IN 1666,

COMPILED FROM VALUABLE DOCUMENTS PUBLISHED AT THE TIME.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE

No sooner was the plague so abated in London, that the inhabitants began to return to their habitations, than a most dreadful fire broke out in the city, and raged as if it had commission to devour every thing that was in its way. On the second of September, 1666, this dismal fire broke out at a baker's shop in Pudding-lane by Fish-street, in the lower part of the city, near Thames-street, (among decayed wooden houses ready to take fire, and full of combustible goods,) in Billingsgate-ward; which ward in a few hours was laid in ashes. It began in the dead of the night, and the darkness very much increased the confusion and horror of the surprising calamity: when it had made havoc of some houses, it rushed down the hill toward the bridge; crossed Thames-street, invaded St. Magnus' church at the bridge foot, and though that church was so great, yet it was not a sufficient barricade against this merciless conqueror; but having scaled and taken this fort, it shot flames with so much the greater advantage into all places round about, and a great building of houses upon the bridge was quickly thrown down to the ground; there, being stayed in its course at the bridge, the fire marched back through the city again, and with great noise and violence, ran along through Thames-street westward, where having such combustible matter to feed on, and such a fierce wind upon its back, it prevailed with little resistance, to the astonishment of the beholders. The fire was soon taken notice of, though in the midst of the night: Fire! fire! fire! resounded through the streets; many started out of their sleep, looked out of their windows; some dressed themselves, and ran to the place. The citizens, affrighted and amazed, delayed the use of timely remedies; and what added to the misfortune, was, the people neglecting their houses, and being so fatally set on the hasty removing of their goods, which were, notwithstanding, devoured by the nimble increase of the flames. A raging east-wind fomented it to an incredible degree, and in a moment raised the fire from the bottoms to the tops of the houses, and scattered prodigious flakes in all placés, which mounted high in the air, as if heaven and earth were threatened with the same conflagration. The fury soon became insuperable against the arts of men and the power of engines; and beside the dismal scenes of flames, ruin, and desolation, there appeared the most killing sight in the distracted looks of the citizens, the wailings of miserable women, the cries of poor children, and decrepid and old people; with all the marks of confusion and despair. No man that had the sense of human miseries could unconcernedly behold the dismal ravage and destruction made in one of the noblest cities of the world.

The lord mayor of the city came with his officers; what a confusion there was!—counsel was taken away; and London, so famous for wisdom and dexterity, could now find neither brains nor hands to prevent its ruin: the decree was gone forth, London must fall: and who could prevent it? No wonder, when so many pillars were removed, the building tumbled. The fire got the mastery, and burnt dreadfully by the force of the wind; it spread quickly, and went on with such force and rage, overturning all so furiously, that the whole city was brought into jeopardy and desolation.

—— Fire commission'd by the winds,
Begins on sheds, but rolling in a round,
On palaces returns.

DRYDEN.

That night most of the Londoners had taken their last sleep in their houses; they little thought it would be so when they went into their beds: they did not in the least expect to hear of such an enemy invading the city, or that they should see him with such fury enter the doors of their houses, break into every room, and look out at their windows with such a threatening countenance.

That which made the ruin more dismal was, that it began on the Lord's day morning; never was there the like Sabbath in London; some churches were in flames that day; God seemed to come down and preach himself in them, as he did in Sinai when the mount burned with fire; such warm preaching those churches never had: in other churches ministers were preaching their farewell sermons; and people were hearing with quaking and astonishment: instead of a holy rest which Christians had usually taken that day, there was a tumultuous hurrying about the streets toward the places that burned, and more tumultuous hurrying upon the spirits of those that sat still, and had only the notice of the ear, of the strange and quick spreading of the fire.

The trained bands were up in arms, watching at every quarter for outlandish men, because of the general fears and rumours that fire-balls were thrown into houses by several of them, to help on and provoke the too furious flames. Now goods were moved hastily from the lower parts of the city, and the body of the people began to retire and draw upward. Yet some hopes were retained on the Sunday that the fire would be extinguished, especially by those who lived in remote parts; they could scarce imagine that the fire a mile distant could reach their houses. All means to stop it proved ineffectual; the wind was so high that flakes of fire and burning matter were carried across several streets, and spread the conflagration everywhere.

But the evening drew on, and now the fire was more visible and dreadful: instead of the black curtains of the night which used to spread over the city, now the curtains were yellow; the smoke that arose from the burning part seemed like so much flame in the night, which being blown upon the other parts by the wind, the whole city at some distance seemed to be on fire. Now hope began to sink, and a general consternation seized upon the spirits of the people: little sleep was taken in London during that night; some were at work to quench the fire, others endeavoured to stop its course by pulling down houses, but all to no purpose; if it were a little allayed or put to a stand in some places, it quickly recruited and recovered its force: it leaped, and mounted, and made the more furious onset, drove back all opposers, snatched the weapons out of their hands, seized upon the water-houses and engines, and made them unfit for service. Some were on their knees in the night, pouring out tears before the Lord, interceding for poor London in the day of its calamity; yet none could prevail to reverse that doom which had gone forth against the city, the fire had received its commission, and all attempts to hinder it were in vain.

Sunday night the fire had got as far as Garlick-hithe in Thames-street, and had crept up into Cannon-street, and levelled it with the ground, and still was making forward by the water side, and upward to the brow of the hill on which the city was built.

On the Monday, Gracechurch-street was all in flames, with Lombard-street on the left, and part of Fenchurch-street on the right, the fire working (though not so fast) against the wind that way: before it were pleasant and stately houses, behind it ruinous and desolate heaps. The burning then was in the fashion of a bow; a dreadful bow it was, such as few eyes had ever seen before!

Then the flames broke in upon Cornhill, that large and spacious street, and quickly crossed the way by the train of wood that lay in the streets untaken away, which had been pulled down from houses to prevent its spreading, and so they licked the whole streets as they went; they mounted to the tops of the highest houses, they descended to the bottom of the lowest cellars; they marched along both sides of the way, with such a roaring noise as never was heard in the city of London; no stately buildings so great as to resist their fury: the Royal Exchange itself, the glory of the merchants, was invaded, and when once the fire was entered, how quickly did it run through the galleries, filling them with flames; then descending the stairs, it compassed the walks, giving forth flaming volleys, and filling the court with fire: by and by down fell all the kings upon their faces, and the greatest part of the building upon them, (the founder's statue only remaining,) with such a noise as was dreadful and astonishing.

September the third the Exchange was burnt, and in three days almost all the city within the walls: the people having none to conduct them right, could do nothing to resist it, but stood and saw their houses burn without remedy; the engines being soon out of order and useless!

Then! then! the city did shake indeed! and the inhabitants did tremble! they flew away in great amazement from their houses, lest the flames should devour them. Rattle! rattle! rattle! was the noise which the fire struck upon the ear round about, as if there had been a thousand iron chariots beating upon the stones; and if you turned your eyes to the opening of the streets where the fire was come, you might see in some places whole streets at once in flames, that issued forth as if they had been so many forges from the opposite windows, and which folding together, united into one great volume throughout the whole street; and then you might see the houses tumble, tumble, tumble, from one end of the street to another, with a great crash! leaving the foundations open to the view of the heavens.

Fearfulness and terror now surprised all the citizens of London; men were in a miserable hurry, full of distraction and confusion; they had not the command of their own thoughts, to reflect and inquire what was fit and proper to be done. It would have grieved the heart of an unconcerned person, to have seen the rueful looks, the pale cheeks, the tears trickling down from the eyes (where the greatness of sorrow and amazement could give leave for such a vent), the smiting of the breast, the wringing of the hands; to hear the sighs and groans, the doleful and weeping speeches of the distressed citizens, when they were bringing forth their wives (some from their child bed) and their little ones (some from their sick beds) out of their houses, and sending them into the fields with their goods. The hope of London seemed gone; their heart had sunk: there was a general remove in the city, and that in a greater hurry than before the plague; their goods being in greater danger by the fire than their persons were by the pestilence. Scarcely were some returned but they must remove again; and not as before, but now without hopes of ever returning and living in those houses any more. The streets were crowded with people and carts, to carry what goods they could get out; they who were most active and had most money to pay carriage at exorbitant prices, saved much, the rest lost almost all. Carts, drays, coaches, and horses, as many as could have entrance into the city, were laden, and any money was given for help; five, ten, twenty, thirty pounds for a cart, to bear forth to the fields some choice things which were ready to be consumed; and some of the countrymen had the conscience to accept the prices which the citizens offered in their extremity! Casks of wine and oil, and other commodities were tumbled along, and the owners shoved as much as they could toward the gates: every one became a porter to himself; and scarcely a back, either of man or woman, but had a burden on it in the streets. It was very melancholy to see such throngs of poor citizens coming in and going forth from the unburnt parts, heavily laden with portions of their goods, but more heavy with grief and sorrow of heart; so that it is wonderful they did not quite sink down under their burdens.

Monday night was a dreadful night! When the wings of the night had shadowed the light of the heavenly bodies, there was no darkness of night in London, for the fire shone about with a fearful blaze, which yielded such light in the streets as it had been the sun at noonday. The fire having wrought backward strangely against the wind to Billingsgate, &c., along Thames-street eastward, ran up the hill to Tower-street; and having marched on from Gracechurch-street, made farther progress in Fenchurch-street; and having spread its rage beyond Queenhithe in Thames-street, westward, mounted up from the water-side through Dowgate and Old-fish-street into Watling-street; but the great fury was in the broader streets; in the midst of the night it came into Cornhill, and laid it in the dust, and running along by the Stocks, there met with another fire which came down Threadneedle-street, a little farther with another which came up Walbrook; a little further with another which came up Bucklersbury; and all these four meeting together, broke into one of the corners of Cheapside, with a dazzling glare, burning heat, and roaring noise, by the falling of so many houses together, that was very amazing! and though it was somewhat stopped in its swift course at Mercer's chapel, yet with great force in a while it burnt through it, and then with great rage proceeded forward in Cheapside.

On Tuesday was the fire burning up the very bowels of London; Cheapside was all in a light fire in a few hours' time; many fires meeting there as in the centre; from Soper-lane, Bow-lane, Bread-street, Friday-street, and Old-change, the fire came up almost together, and broke furiously into the broad street, and most of that side the way was together in flames: a dreadful spectacle! and then, partly by the fire which came down from Mercer's chapel, partly by the fall of the houses across the way, the other side was quickly kindled, and did not stand long after it.

Then the fire got into Blackfriars, and so continued its course by the water, and made up toward St. Paul's church on that side, and Cheapside fire beset the great building on this side; and the church, though all of stone outward, though naked of houses about it, and though so high above all buildings in the city, yet within a while it yielded to the violent assaults of the all-conquering flames, and strangely took fire at the top: the lead melted and ran down as if it had been snow before the sun; and the great beams and massive stones, with a hideous noise, fell on the pavement, and broke through into Faith-church underneath; and great flakes of stone scaled and peeled off strangely from the sides of the walls: the conqueror having got this high fort, darted its flames round about; Paternoster-row, Newgate-street, the Old Bailey, and Ludgate-hill, then submitted themselves to the devouring fire, which, with wonderful speed rushed down the hill into Fleet-street. Cheapside fire marched along Ironmonger-lane, Old-jury, Laurence-lane, Milk-street, Wood-street, Gutter-lane, and Foster-lane; it came along Lothbury, Cateaton-street, &c. From Newgate-street it assaulted Christ-church, conquered that great building, and burned through St. Martins-le-grand toward Aldersgate; and all so furiously as if it would not leave a house standing.

Terrible flakes of fire mounted up to the sky, and the yellow smoke of London ascended up toward heaven like the smoke of a great furnace; a smoke so great as to darken the sun at noon-day; if at any time the sun peeped forth it looked red like blood: the cloud of smoke was so great, that travellers rode at noon-day some miles together in the shadow thereof, though there was no other cloud beside to be seen in the sky.

If Monday night was dreadful, Tuesday night was much more so, when far the greatest part of the city was consumed: many thousands who on Saturday had houses convenient in the city, both for themselves and to entertain others, had not where to lay their heads; and the fields were the only receptacles they could find for themselves and their few remaining goods: most of the late inhabitants lay all night in the open air, with no other canopy over them but that of the heavens. The fire was still making toward them, and threatening the suburbs. It was amazing to see how it spread itself several miles in compass: among other things that night, the sight of Guildhall was a fearful spectacle, which stood, the whole body of it together in view, for several hours after the fire had taken it, without flames (possibly because the timber was such solid oak) in a bright shining coal, as if it had been a palace of gold, or a great building of burnished brass.

On Wednesday morning, when people expected the suburbs would be burnt as well as the city, and with speed were preparing their flight, as well as they could with their luggage, into the country and the neighbouring villages; then the Lord had pity upon poor London: the wind was hushed; the commission of the fire was withdrawing, and it burned so gently, even when it met with no opposition, that it was not hard to be quenched, in many places, with a few hands. The citizens began to gather a little heart and encouragement in their endeavours to quench the fire. A check it had at Leadenhall by that great building; it had a stop in Bishopsgate-street, Fenchurch-street, Lime-street, Mark-lane, and toward the Tower: one means (under God) was the blowing up houses with gunpowder. It was stayed in Lothbury, Broad-street, and Coleman-street; toward the gates it burnt, but not with any great violence; at the Temple also it stayed, and in Holborn, where it had got no great footing; and when once the fire was got under, it was kept under: and on Thursday the flames were extinguished.

Few could take much sleep for divers nights together, when the fire was raging in the streets, and burning down the houses, lest their persons should have been consumed with their substance and habitations. But on Wednesday night, when the people late of London, now of the fields, hoped to get a little rest on the ground where they had spread their beds, a more dreadful fear fell upon them than they had before, through a rumour that the French were coming armed to cut their throats, and spoil them of what they had saved out of the fire: they were now naked, weak, and in ill condition to defend themselves; and the hearts, especially of the females, began to quake and tremble, and were ready to die within them; yet many citizens having lost their houses, and almost all they had, were fired with rage and fury; and they began to stir up themselves like lions, or bears bereaved of their whelps: Now, arm! arm! arm! resounded through the fields and suburbs with a great noise. We may guess the distress and perplexity of the people this night; but it was somewhat alleviated when the falseness of the alarm was discovered.

Never was England in greater danger of being made a prey to a foreign power, than after the firing and fall of the city, which had the strength and treasure of the nation in it.

While the terrors occasioned by the conflagration remained in the minds of men, many eminent, learned, pious divines of the Church of England were more than ordinarily diligent in the discharge of their holy function in this calamitous time; and many ministers who had not conformed, preached in the midst of the burning ruins, to a willing and attentive people: conventicles abounded in every part; it was thought hard to hinder men from worshipping God in any way they could, when there were no churches, nor ministers to look after them. Tabernacles, with all possible expedition, were every where raised for public worship till churches could be built. Among the established clergy were Drs. Tillotson, Stillington, Whitcot, Horton, Patrick, Outram, Mr. White, Mr. Giffard, Mr. Nest, Mr. Meriton, and many others: divines of equal merit and moderation, ornaments of their sacred professions and the established church. Among the Presbyterians were Drs. Manton, Jacomb, Owen, Goodwin, Mr. Thomas Vincent, Mr. Wadsworth, Mr. Janeway, Mr. Thomas Doolittle, Mr. Annesley, Mr. Chester, Mr. Franklin, Mr. Grimes, Mr. Watson, Mr. Nathanael Vincent, Mr. Turner, Mr. Griffiths, Mr. Brooks, Mr. Nye, Mr. Caryl, Mr. Barker.

The loss in goods and houses is scarcely to be valued, or even conceived. The loss of books was an exceeding great detriment, not to the owners only, but to learning in general. The library at Sion College, and most private libraries in London, were burnt.

The fire of London damaged most of all the company of printers and stationers, most of whose habitation, storehouses, shops, stocks, and books, were not only consumed, but their ashes and scorched leaves conveyed aloft, and dispersed by the winds to places above sixteen miles distant, to the great admiration of beholders!

Notwithstanding the great losses by the fire, the devouring pestilence in the city the year preceding, and the chargeable war with the Dutch at that time depending; yet by the king's grace, the wisdom of the parliament then sitting at Westminster, the diligence and activity of the lord mayor, aldermen, and commoners of the city (who were likewise themselves the most considerable losers by the fatal accident) it was in the space of four or five years well-nigh rebuilt. Divers churches, the stately Guildhall, many halls of companies, and other public edifices; all infinitely more uniform, more solid and more magnificent than before; so that no city in Europe (scarcely in the universe) can stand in competition with it in many particulars.

The fire of London ending at the east end of Tower-street, the extent of which came just to the dock on the west side of the Tower, there was nothing between the Tower walls and it but the breadth of the dock, and a great many old timber houses which were built upon the banks of the dock, and in the outward bulwark of the Tower and Tower-ditch (which was then very foul) to the very wall of the Tower itself. Which old houses if the fire had taken hold of, the Tower itself, and all the buildings within it, had in all probability been destroyed. But such was the lieutenant's care of the great charge committed to him, that to prevent future damage; a few weeks after he caused all these old houses which stood between the Tower dock and the Tower wall to be pulled down; and not only them, but all those which were built upon or near the Tower ditch, from the bulwark gate along both the tower-hills, and so to the iron-gate; and caused strong rails of oak to be set up upon the wharf where those houses stood, which were about four hundred: so that by these means, not only the White-tower but the whole outward Tower wall and the ditch round about the same, were all visible to passengers, and afforded a very fine prospect.

calamity, the king himself, roused from his pleasures, commiserated the case of the distressed, and acted like the true father of his people. In a manuscript from the secretary's office we find these words, "All own the immediate hand of God, and bless the goodness and tender care of the king, who made the round of the fire usually twice every day, and for many hours together, on horseback and on foot; gave orders for pursuing the work, by commands, threatenings, desires, example, and good store of money, which he himself distributed to the workers out of a bag which he carried with him for that purpose." At the same time his royal highness the Duke of York also, and many of the nobility, were as diligent as possible; they commended and encouraged the forward, assisted the miserable sufferers, and gave a most generous example to all, by the vigorous opposition they made against the devouring flames.

The king and the duke, with the guards, were almost all the day on horseback, seeing to all that could be done, either for quenching the fire or for carrying off persons or goods to the fields. The king was never observed to be so much affected with any thing in his whole life.

In the dreadful fire of London, the king and the duke did their utmost in person to extinguish it; and after it had been once mastered and broke out again in the Temple, the duke watching there all night, put an effectual stop to it by blowing up houses.

Afterward, when the multitudes of poor people were forced to lodge in the fields, or crowd themselves into poor huts and booths built with deal boards, his majesty was frequent in consulting all ways to relieve these wretches, as well by proclamations as by his orders to the justices of peace, to send provisions into Moorfields and other places; and moreover, he sent them out of the Tower the warlike provisions which were there deposited for the seamen and soldiers, to keep them from starving in this extremity. At the same time he proclaimed a fast throughout England and Wales; and ordered that the distressed condition of the sufferers should be recommended to the charity of all well-disposed persons upon that day, to be afterwards distributed by the hands of the lord mayor of London. Lastly, to show his special care for the city's restoration in council, wherein he first prohibited the hasty building any houses till care should be taken for its re-edification, so as might best secure it from the like fatal accident; for the encouragement of others, he promised to rebuild his custom-house, and to enlarge it, for the benefit of the merchants and trade; which he performed at his own particular charge, and at the expense of ten thousand pounds.

At the news of the fire of London all the good subjects of Ireland were seized with the utmost consternation upon that deplorable accident. In compassion to the sufferers the lord lieutenant (the duke of Ormond) set on foot a subscription for their relief, which rose to a higher value than could be expected in so distressed a country, where there was not money to circulate for the common necessities of the people, or to pay the public taxes: therefore the subscription was made in beeves, thirty thousand of which were sent to London.

EXTRACT FROM THE SPEECH OF SIR EDWARD TURNER, SPEAKER OF THE HONOURABLE HOUSE OF COMMONS, AT THE PROROGATION OF THE PARLIAMENT, FEBRUARY 8, 1667.

“We must for ever with humility acknowledge the justice of God in punishing the whole nation in the late conflagration in London: we know they were not the greatest sinners on whom the tower of Siloam fell; and doubtless all our sins did contribute to the filling up that measure, which being full, drew down the wrath of God upon that city: but it very much reviveth us to behold the miraculous blessing of God upon your majesty’s endeavours for the preservation of that part of the city which is left. We hope God will direct your royal heart and this fortunate island in a few days to lay a foundation stone in the re-building of that royal city; the beauty and praise whereof shall fill the whole earth. For the encouragement of this noble work we have prepared several bills; one for the establishing a judicatory for the speedy determining all actions and causes of action that may arise between landlords and tenants upon this sad accident. Though I persuade myself no Englishman would be exempted from making some offering to carry on the pious undertaking, yet the exemplary charity of your majesty’s twelve reverend judges is fit with honour to be mentioned before your majesty: they are willing to spend all their sand that doth not run out in your majesty’s immediate service, in dispensing justice in their several courts to your people, in hearing and determining the controversies that may arise upon old agreements, and making new rules between owners and tenants, for their mutual agreement in this glorious action. We have likewise prepared a bill for the regularity of the new buildings, that they may be raised with more conveniency, beauty, and security, than they had before: some streets we have ordered to be opened and enlarged, and many obstructions to be removed; but all with your majesty's approbation. This, we conceive, cannot be done with justice, unless a compensation be given to those that shall be losers; we have therefore laid an imposition of twelve pence upon every chaldron and every ton of coals that shall be brought into the port of London for ten years, the better to enable the lord mayor and aldermen to recompense those persons whose ground shall be taken from them.

“Rome was not built in a day: nor can we in the close of this session finish the rules for the dividing the parishes, rebuilding of the churches, and the ornamental parts of the city, that we intended; these things must rest till another session; but we know your majesty in the meantime will take them into your princely consideration, and make it your care that the houses of God, and your royal chamber, be decently and conveniently restored.”

The fire of London had exercised the wits and inventions of many heads, and especially put several ingenious persons on contriving and setting up offices for insuring of houses from fire; since which many of those offices are framed.

All persons were indefatigably industrious in the great work of rebuilding; and when all provisions were made for the city's resurrection, the famous Sir Jonas Moore first of all produced the beautiful Fleet-street, according to the appointed model ; and from that beginning the city grew so hastily toward a general perfection, that within the compass of a few years it far transcended its former splendour.

In the meantime Gresham college was converted into an exchange ; and in the apartments the public business of the city was transacted instead of Guildhall.

To the same place alderman Backwell, a noted banker, removed from Lombard-street, alderman Meynell, and divers other bankers of Lombard-street, were preserved in their estates, and settled in and about Broad-street.

The royal society being driven out from Gresham college, Henry Howard, brother to the duke of Norfolk, late earl marshal of England, invited that noble body to hold their meetings at Arundel-house, where he assigned them very convenient rooms ; and on new-year's day, being himself a member of that society, he very generously presented them and their successors with a fair library of books, being the whole Norfolkian library, with permission of changing such books as were not proper for their collection.

Sir Robert Viner, a very great banker, providentially removed all his concerns twenty-four hours before the furious fire entered Lombard-street, and settled in the African house, which was then kept near the middle of Broad-street, till such time as he built that noble structure in Lombard-street now used for the general post-office, which was purchased by King Charles II. for that purpose. The neatly wrought conduit in the Stocks market-place at the west end of Lombard-street (the spot on which the Lord Mayor's mansion-house is since erected), whereon was placed a large statue of King Charles II. on horseback, trampling upon an enemy, was set up at the sole cost and charges of that worthy citizen and alderman, Sir Robert Viner, knight and baronet.*

The excise-office was kept in Southampton-fields, near Southampton (now Bedford) house.

The general post-office was moved to the two Black Pillars in Bridges-street, Covent-garden.

The affairs of the custom-house were transacted in Mark-lane, at a house called Lord Bayning's, till the custom-house was rebuilt in a much more magnificent, uniform, and commodious manner, by King Charles II., which cost him ten thousand pounds.

The office for hearth-money was kept near Billiter-lane in Leadenhall-street.

The king's great wardrobe, together with the fair dwelling-houses of the master and officers, near Puddle-wharf, being consumed, that office was kept in York-house-buildings.

The buildings of Doctors-Commons in the parish of St. Bennet Paul's wharf, near St. Paul's, being entirely consumed by the dreadful fire, their offices were held at Exeter-house in the Strand until the year 1672, when they returned to their former place, rebuilt in a very

* Of this clumsy piece of sculpture we have the following account from Maitland's Survey, p. 1049:—"It is impossible to quit this place without taking notice of the equestrian statue raised here in honour of Charles II., a thing in itself so exceedingly ridiculous and absurd, that it is in no one's power to look upon it without reflecting on the taste of those who set it up. But when we inquire into the history of it, the farce improves upon our hands, and what was before contemptible, grows entertaining. This statue was originally made for John Sobieski, king of Poland, but by some accident was left upon the workman's hands. About the same time the city was loyal enough to pay their devoirs to king Charles immediately upon his restoration; and finding this statue ready made to their hands, resolved to do it in the cheapest way, and convert the Polander into a Briton, and the Turk underneath, into Oliver Cromwell, to make their compliment complete; and the turban upon the last-mentioned figure, is an undeniable proof of the truth of the story."

The college of physicians had purchased a house and ground at the end of Amen-street, whereon the famous Dr. Harvey, at his proper charge, did erect a magnificent structure, both for a library and a public hall: this goodly edifice could not escape the fury of the dreadful fire; and the ground being but a leasehold, the Fellows purchased a fair piece of ground in Warwick-lane, whereon they have erected a very magnificent edifice, with a noble apartment for the containing an excellent library, given them partly by the Marquis of Dorchester, but chiefly by that eminent professor Sir Theodore Mayerne, knight.

The former bourse (or Royal Exchange) began to be erected in the year 1566, just one hundred years before it was burnt, at the cost and charge of that noble merchant Sir Thomas Gresham: it was built of brick, and yet was the most splendid bourse then in Europe.

It is now rebuilt within and without of excellent stone, with such curious and admirable architecture, especially for a front, a high turret or steeple, wherein are an harmonious chime of twelve bells, and for arch-work, that it surpasses all other bourses. It is built quadrangular, with a large court wherein the merchants may assemble, and the greatest part, in case of rain or hot sunshine, may be sheltered in side galleries or porticoes. The whole fabric cost fifty thousand pounds, whereof one half was disbursed by the chamber of London, or corporation of the city, and the other half by the company of mercers.

Before the dreadful fire, there were all around the quadrangle of this Royal Exchange the statues of the sovereign princes since what was called the Norman Conquest, and by the care and cost of the city companies most of those niches were again filled with the like curious statues, in marble or alabaster.

St. Paul's cathedral was a new building at the time of the fire, the stone-work almost finished; but it is now rebuilt with greater solidity, magnificence, and splendour, by the most renowned architect Sir Christopher Wren.

Not far from the college of Doctors-Commons stood the college of Heralds, in an ancient house called Derby-house, being built by Thomas Stanley, Earl of Derby, who married Margaret, Countess of Richmond, mother of King Henry VII., where their records were preserved. This college was burnt down, but the books and records were preserved, and placed by the king's appointment at the lower end of the Court of Requests.

Since the late dreadful fire this college has been handsomely rebuilt upon St. Bennet's hill, near Doctors-Commons,* where their library is now kept.

The house of St. Bartholomew's hospital escaped the fury of the great fire, but most of the estates belonging to it were consumed.

The companies' halls were rebuilt, all at the charges of each fraternity, with great magnificence; being so many noble structures or palaces, with gallant frontispieces, stately courts, spacious rooms; the halls especially, from which the whole are named, are not only ample enough to feast all the livery in each company, some to the number of three or four hundred; but many of them are fit to receive a crowned head with all its nobles, those of each of the twelve companies especially. The company of mercers, beside their hall, have a sumptuous and spacious chapel for divine service.

Those city gates which were burnt down, as Ludgate

* Taken down in 1869 when Queen Victoria Street was made.

and Newgate, were rebuilt with great solidity and magnificence.

The attempt to make Fleet-brook or ditch navigable to Holborn-bridge, was a mighty chargeable and beautiful work: and though it did not fully answer the designed purpose, it was remarkable for the curious stone bridges over it, and the many huge vaults on each side thereof, to treasure up Newcastle coals for the use of the poor.

The whole damage sustained by the fire was almost inconceivable and incredible; but the following method of computation hath been taken to form some sort of gross estimate; and at the time was accounted very moderate:—

The fire spread itself (beside breadth) from near Tower-hill to St. Dunstan's church, in Fleet-street. After it had burnt almost three days and three nights, some seamen taught the people to blow up some of the next houses with gunpowder; which stopped the fire: so that (contrary to the inscription on the Monument) there were human counsels in the stopping of the fire. It stopped at Holborn-bridge; at St. Sepulchre's church, when the church was burnt; in Aldgate, and Cripplegate, and other places on the wall; in Austin friars, the Dutch church stopped it, and escaped. It stopped in Bishopsgate-street, in Leadenhall-street, in the midst of Fenchurch-street, and near the Tower. Alderman Jefferies lost tobacco to the value of twenty thousand pounds.

EXTRACT FROM THE CERTIFICATE OF THE SURVEYORS APPOINTED TO SURVEY THE RUINS.

The fire began September the second, 1666, at Mr. Farryner's, a baker, in Pudding-lane, between one and two in the morning, and continued burning till the sixth; did over-run three hundred seventy-three acres within the walls: eighty-nine parish churches, beside chapels, burnt: eleven parishes within the walls standing. Houses burnt, thirteen thousand and two hundred.

JONAS MOORE, } Surveyors.
RALPH GATRIX, }

The superstition and zeal of those times made canonization much cheaper in a Protestant than a Popish church: a vehement preacher was a chief saint among the godly, and a few warm expressions were esteemed little less than prophecies.

In the dedication to the Rev. Mr. Reeves' sermon, preached 1655, are the following queries:—

“Can sin and the city's safety, can impenitency and impunity stand long together? Fear you not some plague? Some coal blown with the breath of the Almighty that may sparkle, and kindle, and burn you to such cinders that not a wall or pillar may be left to testify the remembrance of a city?”

The same gentleman said—“Your looking-glasses will be snatched away, your mirrors cracked, your diamonds shivered in pieces; this goodly city all in shreds; ye may seek for a pillar or threshold of your ancient dwellings, but not find one: all your spacious mansions and sumptuous monuments are then gone; not a porch, pavement, ceiling, staircase, turret, lantern, bench, screen, pane of a window, post, nail, stone, or dust of your former houses to be seen. No! with wringing hands you may ask, where are those sweet places where we traded, feasted, slept? where we lived like masters, and shone like morning-stars? No! the houses are fallen, and the householders dropped with them: we have nothing but naked streets, naked fields for shelter; not so much as a chamber to couch down our children, or repose our own members when we are spent, or afflicted with sickness. Woe unto us! our sins have pulled down our houses, shaken down our city; we are the most harbourless people in the world; like foreigners rather than natives; yea, rather like beasts than men: foxes have holes and fowls have nests, but we have neither holes nor nests; our sins have deprived us of couch and covert: we should be glad if an hospital would receive us, dens or caves shelter us: the bleak air and cold ground are our only shades and refuges. But, alas! this is but the misery of the stone-work, of arches, roofs, &c.”

The following paragraph is taken from Mr. Rosewell's "Causes and Cures of the Pestilence," pp. 27, 28, printed at London in the year of the Great Plague, 1665, a year before the fire of London:—

“Is it not of the Lord that the people shall labour in the very fire! and weary themselves for vanity! It is of the Lord, surely! It comes to pass by the secret counsel of God, that these houses and cities which they build, shall either come to be consumed by fire; or else, the people shall weary themselves in vain; for vanity; to no purpose; seeing it comes so soon to be destroyed and ruined, what they build."

ACCOUNT OF THE FIRE OF LONDON, PUBLISHED BY AUTHORITY, FROM THE London Gazette.

Sept. 2. About two o'clock this morning a sudden and lamentable fire broke out in this city, beginning not far from Thames-street, near London-bridge; which continues still with great violence, and hath already burnt down to the ground many houses thereabouts: which said accident affected his majesty with that tenderness and compassion that he was pleased to go himself in person, with his royal highness, to give orders that all possible means should be used for quenching the fire, or stopping its further spreading. In which care, the right honourable the earl of Craven was sent by his majesty, to be more particularly assisting to the lord mayor and magistrates; and several companies of his guards were sent into the city, to be helpful in what means they could in so great a calamity.

Whitehall, Sept. 8. The ordinary course of this paper being interrupted by a sad and lamentable accident of fire lately happened in the city of London, it hath been thought fit to satisfy the minds of so many of his majesty's good subjects who must needs be concerned for the issue of so great an accident, to give this short but true account of it.

On the 2nd instant at one o'clock in the morning there happened to break out a sad and deplorable fire in Pudding-lane, near New Fish-street, which falling out at that hour of the night, and in a quarter of the town so close built with wooden pitched houses, spread itself so far before day, and with such distraction to the inhabitants and neighbours, that care was not taken for the timely preventing the further diffusion of it, by pulling down houses, as ought to have been; so that the lamentable fire in a short time became too big to be mastered by any engines, or working near it. It fell out most unhappily too, that a violent easterly wind fomented it, and kept it burning all that day, and the night following, spreading itself up to Gracechurch-street, and downward from Cannon-street to the water side as far as the Three Cranes in the Vintry.

The people in all parts about it were distracted by the vastness of it, and their particular care was to carry away their goods: many attempts were made to prevent the spreading of it by pulling down houses, and making great intervals, but all in vain, the fire seizing upon the timber and rubbish, and so continuing itself, even through those places, and raging in a bright flame all Monday and Tuesday, notwithstanding his majesty's own, and his royal highness's indefatigable and personal pains to apply all possible means to prevent it; calling upon and helping the people with their guards, and a great number of nobility and gentry unweariedly assisting therein, for which they were requited with a thousand blessings from the poor distressed people. By the favour of God the wind slacked a little on Tuesday night, and the flames meeting with brick buildings at the Temple, by little and little it was observed to lose its force on that side, so that on Wednesday morning we began to hope well, and his royal highness never departing nor slackening his personal care, wrought so well that day, assisted in some parts by the lords of the council before and behind it, that a stop was put to it at the Temple church; near Holborn-bridge; Pye-corner; Aldersgate; Cripplegate; near the lower end of Coleman-street; at the end of Basinghall-street; by the Postern at the upper end of Bishopsgate-street; and Leadenhall-street; at the standard in Cornhill; at the church in Fenchurch-street; near Clothworkers hall in Mincing-lane; in the middle of Mark-lane; and at the Tower-dock.

On Thursday, by the blessing of God, it was wholly beat down and extinguished. But that evening it burst out afresh at the Temple, by the falling of some sparks (as is supposed) upon a pile of wooden buildings; but his royal highness, who watched there the whole night in person, by the great labour and diligence used, and especially by applying powder to blow up the houses about it, before day happily mastered it.

Divers strangers, Dutch and French, were, during the fire, apprehended upon suspicion that they contributed maliciously to it, who are all imprisoned, and informations prepared to make severe inquisition hereupon by my lord chief-justice Keeling, assisted by some of the lords of the privy council, and some principal members of the city: notwithstanding which suspicions, the manner of the burning all along in a train, and so blown forward in all its ways by strong winds, makes us conclude the whole was an effect of an unhappy chance, or to speak better, the heavy hand of God upon us, for our sins, showing us the terror of his judgment, in thus raising the fire, and immediately after his miraculous and never enough to be acknowledged mercy, in putting a stop to it when we were in the last despair, and that all attempts for the quenching it, however industriously pursued, seemed insufficient. His majesty then sat hourly in council, and ever since hath continued in making rounds about the city, in all parts of it where the danger and mischief was greatest, till this morning that he hath sent his grace the duke of Albemarle, whom he hath called for to assist him in this great occasion; to put his happy and successful hand to the finishing this memorable deliverance.

About the Tower, the seasonable orders given for pulling down houses to secure the magazines of powder, was most especially successful, that part being up the wind, notwithstanding which, it came almost to the very gates of it, so as by the early provision, the several stores of war lodged in the Tower were entirely saved; and we have hitherto this infinite cause particularly to give God thanks, that the fire did not happen in any of those places where his majesty's naval stores are kept; so as though it hath pleased God to visit us with his own hand, he hath not, by disfurnishing us with the means of carrying on the war, subjected us to our enemies.

It must be observed, that this fire happened at a part of the town where, though the commodities were not very rich, yet they were so bulky that they could not be removed, so that the inhabitants of that part where it first began have sustained very great loss; but by the best inquiry we can make, the other parts of the town, where the commodities were of greater value, took the alarm so early that they saved most of their goods of value, which possibly may have diminished the loss; though some think, that if the whole industry of the inhabitants had been applied to the stopping of the fire, and not to the saving their particular goods, the success might have been much better, not only to the public, but to many of them in their own particulars.

Through this sad accident it is easy to be imagined how many persons were necessitated to remove themselves and goods into the open fields, where they were forced to continue some time, which could not but work compassion in the beholders; but his majesty's care was most signal on this occasion, who, besides his personal pains, was frequent in consulting all ways for relieving those distressed persons, which produced so good effect, as well by his majesty's proclamations, and orders issued to the neighbouring justices of the peace, to encourage the sending provisions into the markets, which are publicly known, as by other directions, that when his majesty, fearing lest other orders might not yet have been sufficient, had commanded the victualler of his navy to send bread into Moorfields for the relief of the poor, which for the more speedy supply he sent in biscuit out of the sea stores; it was found that the markets had been already so well supplied, that the people, being unaccustomed to that kind of bread, declined it, and so it was returned in great part to his majesty's stores again, without any use made of it.

And we cannot but observe to the confusion of all his majesty's enemies, who endeavoured to persuade the world abroad of great parties and disaffection at home, against his majesty's government; that a greater instance of the affections of this city could never be given than hath now been given in this sad and most deplorable accident, when, if at any time, disorder might have been expected, from the losses, distractions, and almost desperation of some persons in their private fortunes, thousands of people not having habitations to cover them. And yet all this time it hath been so far from any appearance of designs or attempts against his majesty's government, that his majesty, and his royal brother, out of their care to stop and prevent the fire, exposing frequently their persons, with very small attendants, in all parts of the town, sometimes even to be intermixed with those who laboured in the business; yet nevertheless, there hath not been observed so much as a murmuring word to fall from any; but, on the contrary, even those persons whose losses render their conditions most desperate, and to be fit objects of others prayers, beholding those frequent instances of his majesty's care of his people, forgot their own misery, and filled the streets, with their prayers for his majesty, whose trouble they seemed to compassionate before their own.

Whitehall, Sept. 12. His majesty in a religious sense of God's heavy hand upon this kingdom, in the late dreadful fire happened in the city of London, hath been pleased to order that the tenth October next be observed as a general and solemn fast throughout England, Wales, &c., and that the distresses of those who have more particularly suffered in that calamity be on that day most effectually recommended to the charity of all well-disposed Christians, in the respective churches and chapels of this kingdom, to be afterward, by the hands of the lord mayor of the city of London, distributed for the relief of such as shall be found most to need it.

Whitehall, Sept. 15. His majesty pursuing, with a gracious impatience, his pious care for the speedy restoration of his city of London, was pleased to pass the twelfth instant his declaration in council to his city of London upon that subject, full of that princely tenderness and affection which he is pleased on all occasions to express for that his beloved city.

In the first place, upon the desires of the lord mayor and court of aldermen, he is pleased to prohibit the hasty building of any edifice, till such speedy care be taken for the re-edification of the city as may best secure it from the like accidents, and raise it to a greater beauty and comeliness than formerly it had; the lord mayor and aldermen being required to pull down what shall contrary to this prohibition be erected, and return the names of such refractory persons to his majesty and his council, to be proceeded against according to their deserts.

That any considerable number of men addressing themselves to the court of aldermen, and manifesting in what places their ground lies upon which they intend to build, shall in short time receive such order and direction that they shall have no cause to complain.

That no person erect any house or building but of brick or stone, that they be encouraged to practise the good husbandry of strongly arching their cellars, by which divers persons have received notable benefit in the late fire.

That Fleet-street, Cheapside, Cornhill, and all other eminent streets, be of a breadth, to prevent the mischief one side may receive from the other by fire; that no streets, especially near the water, be so narrow as to make the passages uneasy or inconvenient; nor any alleys or lanes erected but upon necessity, for which there shall be published rules and particular orders.

That a fair quay and wharf be left on all the river side, no houses to be erected but at a distance declared by the rules. That none of those houses next the river be inhabited by brewers, dyers, or sugar-bakers, who, by their continual smoke, contribute much to the unhealthiness of the adjacent places; but that such places be allotted them by the lord mayor and court of aldermen, as may be convenient for them, without prejudice of the neighbourhood.

That the lord mayor and court of aldermen cause an exact survey to be made of the ruins, that it may appear to whom the houses and ground did belong, what term the occupiers were possessed of, what rents were paid, and to whom the reversions and inheritances did appertain, for the satisfying of all interests, that no man's right be sacrificed to the public convenience. After which a plot and model shall be framed of the whole building, which no doubt may so well please all persons, as to induce them willingly to conform to such rules and orders as shall be agreed to.

His majesty likewise recommends the speedy building some of those many churches which have been burnt, to the charity and magnanimity of well-disposed persons, whom he will direct and assist in the model, and by his bounty encourage all other ways that shall be desired.

And to encourage the work by his example, his majesty will use all expedition to rebuild the custom-house, and enlarge it for the more convenience of the merchants, in the place where it formerly stood: and upon all his own lands, will part with any thing of his own right and benefit, for the advancement of the public benefit and beauty of the city; and remit to all persons who shall erect any new buildings, according to this his gracious declaration, all duties arising from hearth-money for the space of seven years; as by the declaration itself more at large appears.

Whitehall, Sept. 18. This day was presented to his majesty by his highness the Duke of York, Edmundbury Godfrey, Esq., one of his majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex, and city and liberty of Westminster, who, after the public thanks and acknowledgment of his eminent service done in helping to suppress the late fire in the city and liberty of London, received the honour of knighthood.

Whitehall, Sept. 29. This day, by warrant from his majesty's principal secretaries of state, the person of Valentine Knight was committed to the custody of one of his majesty's messengers in ordinary, for having presumed to publish in print certain propositions for rebuilding the city of London, with considerable advantages to his majesty's revenue by it, as if his majesty would draw benefit to himself from so public a calamity of his people, of which his majesty is known to have so deep sense, that he is pleased to seek rather by all means to give them ease under it.

Westminster, Sept. 28. This day the house of commons resolved, That the humble thanks of the house should be given his majesty for his great care and endeavour to prevent the burning of the city.

Leghorn, Oct. 18. The merchants here, in consideration of the losses sustained in London by the late fire, have out of their charity, raised near 300*l.* towards their relief, which they intend speedily to return, to be distributed as his majesty pleases.

London, Oct. 29. This day Sir William Bolton, Lord Mayor for the year ensuing, went in his coach to Westminster, attended by his brethren the aldermen, the sheriffs, and other eminent citizens in their coaches, where he was sworn with the usual ceremonies.

Whitehall, Oct. 30. Sir Jonas Moore, with some other proprietors of houses lately demolished by the fire, in Fleet-street, having prayed liberty to rebuild the same, according to such model, form and scantling as should be set them by the committee appointed by his majesty for the advancement of that great work (to which they offered with all willingness to submit and conform themselves); it was this day ordered by his majesty in council, that the said proprietors shall have their liberty to re-edify their buildings accordingly.

By Stat. 19 and 20 Car. 2. Any three or more of the judges were authorized to hear and determine all differences between landlords and tenants, or occupiers of buildings or other things by the fire demolished. They were, without the formalities of courts of law or equity, upon the inquisition or verdict of jurors, testimonies of witnesses upon oath, examination of persons interested, or otherwise, to determine all differences: they were, in complaints, to issue out notes of time and place for the parties attendance, and proceed to make orders: their determinations were final, without appeal, writ of error, or reversal. Their orders were to be obeyed by all persons, and binding to representatives for ever. The judgments and determinations were recorded in a book by them signed; which book is placed and intrusted in the custody of the lord mayor and aldermen for the time being, to remain as a perpetual and lasting record. The judges were not to take any fee or reward, directly or indirectly, for any thing they did by virtue of that act. All differences not being determined, the act was continued in force till Sept. 29, 1672.

In gratitude to the memory of these judges, the city caused their pictures, in full proportion in their scarlet robes, to be set up in the Guildhall, with their names underneath, viz. :—

Sir Heneage Finch,	Sir John Vaughan,
Sir Orlando Bridgman,	Sir John North,
Sir Matthew Hale,	Sir Thomas Twisden,
Sir Richard Rainsford,	Sir Christopher Turner,
Sir Edward Turner,	Sir William Wyld,
Sir Thomas Tyrril,	Sir Hugh Windham,
Sir John Archer,	Sir William Ellys,
Sir William Morton,	Sir Edward Thurland,
Sir Robert Atkins,	Sir Timothy Lyttleton,
Sir Samuel Brown,	Sir John Kelynge,
Sir Edward Atkins,	Sir William Windham.

The city rose out of its ashes after the dreadful fire, as it was first built, not presently, by building continued streets, in any one part, but first here a house and there a house, to which others by degrees were joined; till, at last, single houses were united into whole streets; whole streets into one beautiful city; not merely as before, a great and magnificent city, in a short time it not only excelled itself, but any other city in the world, that comes near it, either in largeness or number of inhabitants.

The beginning of the year 1670, the city of London was rebuilt, with more space and splendour than had been before seen in England. The act for rebuilding it was drawn by Sir Matthew Hale, with such true judgment and foresight, that the whole city was raised out of its ashes without any suits of law; which if that bill had not prevented them, would have brought a second charge on the city, not much less than the fire itself had been. And upon that, to the amazement of all Europe, London was, in four years time, rebuilt with so much beauty and magnificence, that they who saw it in both states, before and after the fire, could not reflect on it without wondering where the wealth could be found to bear so vast a loss as was made by the fire, and so prodigious an expense as was incurred in the rebuilding. This good and great work was very much forwarded by Sir William Turner, Lord Mayor, 1669. He was so much honoured and beloved, that at the end of the year they chose him again; but he refused re-appointment, as being an unusual thing.

Whatever the unfortunate citizens of London suffered by this dreadful fire, it is manifest, that a greater blessing could not have happened for the good of posterity; for, instead of very narrow, crooked, and incommodious streets, dark, irregular and ill-contrived wooden houses, with their several stories jutting out, or hanging over each other, whereby the circulation of the air was obstructed, noisome vapours harboured, and verminous, pestilential atoms nourished, as is manifest, by the city not being clear of the plague for twenty-five years before, and only free from contagion three years in above seventy, but by enlarging the streets, and the modern way of building, there is such a free circulation of air, that offensive vapours are expelled, and the city freed from pestilential symptoms; so that it may now justly be averred that there is no place in the kingdom where the inhabitants enjoy a better state of health, or live to a greater age, than do the citizens of London.

SEVERAL OPINIONS CONCERNING THE CAUSES OF THE GREAT FIRE.

Whether the fire came casually or on design, remains still a secret; and though the general opinion might be that it was casual, yet there were presumptions on the other side of a very odd nature. Great calamities naturally produce various conjectures; men seldom considering that the most stupendous effects often proceed from minute causes, or remote accidents. People failed not to give scope to their imaginations, and to form guesses concerning the causes and authors of this afflicting and astonishing misfortune.

The king in his speech calls it "GOD'S JUDGMENT;" the pious and religious, and at first all other men, generally and naturally ascribed it to the just vengeance of heaven, on a city where vice and immorality reigned so openly and shamefully, which had not been sufficiently humbled by the raging pestilence of the foregoing year.

Sir Edward Turner, Speaker of the House of Commons, at presenting bills for the royal assent, says, "We must for ever with humility acknowledge the justice of God in punishing this whole nation by the late dreadful conflagration of London."

The act of common council for rebuilding, says, "The fire was, by all, justly discerned as a most sad and dismal judgment of heaven."

But time soon produced abundance of suspicions and variety of opinions concerning the means and instruments made use of.

There were some so bold as even to suspect the king. These reports, and Oates and Bedloe's narratives, are suppositions too monstrous, and the evidence too wretchedly mean to deserve consideration.

The citizens were not well satisfied with the duke of York's behaviour; they thought he was a little too gay and negligent for such an occasion; that his look and air discovered the pleasure he took in the dreadful spectacle: on which account, a jealousy that he was concerned in it was spread with great industry, but with very little appearance of truth.

Some suspected it was an insidious way of the Dutch and French making war upon the English; their two fleets being then nearest to a conjunction. What increased the suspicion was, that some criminals that suffered were said to be under the direction of a committee at London, and received orders from another council in Holland.

Not long before the fire the French sent the governor of Chousey in a small boat with a letter to major-general Lambert, then prisoner in Guernsey, to offer him terms to contrive the delivery of that island to them.

Divers strangers, both French and Dutch, were apprehended upon suspicion, imprisoned, and strictly examined. It was said, a Dutch boy of ten years old, confessed that his father, his uncle, and himself, had thrown fire-balls into the house where the fire began, through a window which stood open.

The English fleet had some time before landed on the Vly, an island near the Texel, and burnt it; upon which some came to De Wit, and offered, in revenge, if they were but assisted to set London on fire; but he rejected the [villanous] proposal, and thought no more on it till he heard the city was burnt.

The fire which laid so great a part of London in ashes, gave a fresh occasion to the enemies of the republicans to charge them with being the malicious authors thereof; because the fire happened to break out the third of September, a day esteemed fortunate to the republicans, on account of the victories of Dunbar and Worcester, obtained by Oliver Cromwell, when general of the armies of the commonwealth of England.

In the April before, some commonwealth men were found in a plot, and hanged; and at their execution confessed, that they had been requested to assist in a design of firing London on the second of September.

At the trial of the conspirators at the Old Bailey, it appeared, a design was laid to surprise the Tower and fire the city; the third of September was pitched on for the attempt, as being found by Lilly's almanack, and a scheme erected for that purpose, to be a lucky day. The third of September was a day auspicious and full of expectation from one party, but at this time ominous and direful to the nation. The city was burnt at the time projected and prognosticated; which gave a strong suspicion, though not a proof, of the authors and promoters of it.

The Dutch were pressed by the commonwealth men to invade England, and were assured of powerful assistance, and hopes of a general insurrection, but they would not venture in so hazardous a design.

Though several persons were imprisoned, it was not possible to discover, or prove, that the house where this dreadful calamity began, was fired on purpose. Whether it was wilful or accidental was a long time a party dispute.

The great talk at that time was, Who were the burners of the city? Some said it was contrived and carried on by a conspiracy of the Papists and Jesuits, which was afterward offered to be made appear in the popish plot. And there came in so many testimonies to prove that it was the plotted weapon of the Papists, as caused the parliament to appoint a committee to inquire into it, and receive informations.

By the dreadful fire in 1666, multitudes of people lost their estates, goods, and merchandise; and many families, once in flourishing circumstances, were reduced to beggary. From the inscription on the plinth of the lower pedestal of the Monument it appears that the Papists were considered to be the authors of this fire; the parliament being of this persuasion, addressed the king to issue a proclamation, requiring all popish priests and Jesuits to depart the kingdom within a month; and appointed a committee, who received evidence of some Papists who were seen throwing fire-balls into houses, and of others who had inflammable materials in their pockets. This sad disaster produced some kind of liberty to the non-conformists.

A sudden and dreadful massacre of the Protestants was feared; and the suspicion confirmed by particular kinds of knives found after the fire in barrels.

Several evidences were given to the committee that men were seen in several parts of the city casting fire-balls into houses; some that were brought to the guard of soldiers, and to the duke of York, but were never heard of afterwards. Some weeks after Sir Robert Brooks, chairman of the committee, went to France, and as he was ferried over a river was drowned, with a kinsman of his, and the business drowned with him.

Oates, in his narrative, says, The dreadful fire in 1666 was principally managed by Strange, the provincial of the Jesuits, in which the society employed eighty or eighty-six men, and spent seven hundred fire-balls; and over all their vast expense, they were fourteen thousand pounds gainers by the plunder; among which was a box of jewels consisting of a thousand carats of diamonds. He farther learned, that the fire in Southwark in 1676 was brought about by the like means; and though in that they were at the expense of a thousand pounds, they made shift to get two thousand clear into their own pockets.

Mr. Echard was told by an eminent prelate, that Dr. Grant, a Papist, was strongly suspected, who having a share in the water-works, contrived, as is believed, to stop up the pipes the night before the fire broke out, so that it was many hours before any water could be got after the usual manner.

Dr. Lloyd, afterward bishop of Worcester, told Dr. Burnett, that one Grant, a Papist, had sometime before applied himself to Lloyd, who had great interest with the countess of Clarendon (who had a large estate in the new river, which is brought from Ware to London), and said he could raise that estate considerably if she would make him a trustee for her. His schemes were probable, and he was made one of the board that governed that matter; and by that he had a right to come as often as he pleased to view their works at Islington. He went thither the Saturday before the fire broke out, and called for the key of the place where the heads of the pipes were, and turned all the cocks, which were then open, and stopped the water, and went away, and carried the keys with him. When the fire broke out next morning, they opened the pipes in the streets to find water, but there was none. Some hours were lost in sending to Islington, where the doors were to be broke open, and the cocks turned; and it was long before the water got from Islington. Grant denied that he turned the cocks; but the officer of the works affirmed that he had, according to order, set them all a-running, and that no person had got the keys from him but Grant; who confessed he had carried away the keys, but did it without design.

When we consider, several depositions were made after the fire, of its breaking out in several different places at the same time, and that one man confessed his setting fire to the houses where it began, when he was executed for it: when we remember bishop Lloyd's testimony concerning Grant; we cannot easily be convinced that it was entirely accidental.

Bishop Kennet gives the following account: there was but one man tried at the Old Bailey for being the incendiary, who was convicted by his own confession, and executed for it. His name was Roger* Hubert, a French Huguenot† of Rohan in Normandy. Some people shammed away this confession, and said he was Non compos mentis; and had a mind, it seems, to assume the glory of being hanged for the greatest villain. Others say he was sober and penitent; and being, after conviction, carried through the ruins to show where he put fire, he himself directed them through the ashes and rubbish, and pointed out the spot where the first burning house stood.

The fire was generally charged on the Papists; one Hubert, a Frenchman, who was seized in Essex as he was flying to France, confessed he had begun the conflagration. He was blindfolded, and purposely conducted to wrong places, which he told them it was not where he began the flames; but when he was brought to the right place, he confessed that was where he threw the fire-ball into the baker's house, the place where the fatal fire began, which he persisted in to the last moments of his execution. He was hanged upon no other evidence: though his broken account made some believe him melancholy mad.

But Oates several years afterwards informed the world the execrable deed was performed by a knot of eighty Jesuits, friars, and priests, of several nations.

* Robert, Rapin.

† Bishop Burnet and some others say he was a Papist.

After all examinations there was but one man tried for being the incendiary, who confessing the fact was executed for it: this was Robert Hubert, a French Huguenot of Rohan in Normandy, a person falsely said to be a Papist, but really a sort of lunatic, who by mere accident was brought into England just before the breaking out of the fire, but not landed till two days after, as appeared by the evidence of Laurence Peterson, the master of the ship who had him on board.

It was soon after complained of, that Hubert was not sufficiently examined as to who set him to work, and who joined with him. And Mr. Hawles in his remarks upon Fitzharris's trial is bold to say, that the commons resolving to examine Hubert upon that matter next day, Hubert was hanged before the house sat, so could tell no farther tales.

Lord Russel and Sir Henry Capel observed to the House of Commons (1680) that those that were taken in carrying on that wicked act, were generally discharged without trial.

In 1679 the House of Commons was suddenly alarmed with an information of a fresh design of the Papists to burn London a second time. The house of one Bird in Fetter-lane being set on fire, his servant Elizabeth Oxly, was suspected of firing it wilfully, and sent to prison. She confessed the fact, and declared she had been employed to do it by one Stubbs, a Papist, who had promised her five pounds. Stubbs being taken up, confessed he persuaded her to it, and that father Giffard his confessor put him upon it; telling him it was no sin to burn all the houses of heretics. He added he had frequent conferences on this affair with Giffard and two Irishmen. Stubbs and the maid declared, the Papists were to make an insurrection, and expected an army of sixty thousand men from France. It was generally inferred from this incident, that it was not Giffard's fault [nor that of his party] that the city of London was not burnt as in the year 1666: and confirmed those in their opinion who thought that general conflagration was the contrivance and work of the Papists.

The hand of man was made use of in the beginning and carrying on of this fire. The beginning of the fire at such a time, when there had been so much hot weather which had dried the houses, and made them the more fit for fuel; the beginning of it in such a place, where there were so many timber houses, and the shops filled with so much combustible matter; and the beginning of it just when the wind blew so fiercely upon that corner toward the rest of the city, which then was like tinder to the sparks; this doth smell of a Popish design, hatched in the same nest with the gunpowder plot. The world sufficiently knows how correspondent this is to Popish principles and practices; they might, without any scruple of their kinds of conscience, burn an heretical city, as they count it, into ashes: for beside the dispensations they can have from his Holiness (rather his Wickedness) it is not unlikely but they count such an action as this meritorious.

Lord Chancellor (Earl of Nottingham) in his speech in giving judgment against Lord Viscount Stafford, said, "Who can doubt any longer that London was burnt by Papists?" though there was not one word in the whole trial relating to it.

The inscription on the plinth of the lower pedestal of the Monument has given an opportunity to the reverend Mr. Crookshanks to say, it appears that the Papists were the authors of the fire; and that the Parliament being of the same persuasion addressed the king.

The inscription is in English :

“This pillar was set up in perpetual remembrance of the most dreadful burning of this Protestant city, begun and carried on by the treachery and malice of the Popish faction, in the beginning of September, in the year of our Lord 1666. In order to the carrying on their horrid plot for extirpating the Protestant religion and old English liberty, and introducing Popery and slavery.”

This inscription was erased by king James upon his succession to the crown; but reinscribed presently after the revolution, in such deep characters as are not easily blotted out.

The latter part of the inscription on the north side [Sed furor papisticus, qui tam dira patravit, nondum restinguitur.] containing an offensive truth, was erased at king James's accession, and re-inscribed soon after the revolution.

Mr. Pope differs much in his opinion concerning these inscriptions, when he says,

Where London's column, pointing at the skies,
Like a tall bully, rears its head, and lies.

It seems almost wonderful (says the author of the Craftsman) that the plague was not as peremptorily imputed to the Papists as the fire.

There was a general suspicion of incendiaries laying combustible stuff in many places, having observed several houses to be on fire at the same time: but we are told, God with his great bellows did blow upon it, and made it spread quickly, and horrible flakes of fire mounted to the skies.

There was a strange concurrence of several natural causes which occasioned the fire so vigorously to spread and increase.

There was a great supineness and negligence in the people of the house where it began: it began between one or two o'clock after midnight, when all were in a dead sleep: on a Saturday night, when many of the eminent citizens, merchants, and others, were retired into the country, and left servants to look to their city houses: it happened in the long vacation, at a time of year when many wealthy citizens are wont to be in the country at fairs, or getting in debts, and making up accounts with their chapmen.

The houses where it began were mostly built of timber, and those very old: the closeness and narrowness of the streets did much facilitate the progress of the fire, and prevented the bringing in engines. The wares and commodities stowed and vended in those parts were most combustible; as oil, pitch, tar, cordage, hemp, flax, rosin, wax, butter, cheese, wine, brandy, sugar, and such like.

The warmth of the preceding season had so dried the timber that it was never more apt to take fire; and an easterly wind (which is the driest of all) had blown for several days together before, and at that time very strongly.

The unexpected failing of the water from the New River; the engine at London-bridge called the Thames water-tower being out of order, was in a few hours itself burnt down, so that the pipes which conveyed the water from thence through the streets were soon empty.

Besides, there was an unusual negligence at first, and a confidence of easily quenching it, and of its stopping at several places afterward; which at last turned into confusion, consternation, and despair: people choosing rather by flight to save their goods, than by a vigorous opposition to save their own houses and the whole city.

Thus a small spark, from an unknown cause, for want of timely care, increased to such a flame, that nothing could extinguish, which laid waste the greatest part of the city in three days' time.

The king in his speech to the parliament says, "God be thanked for our meeting together in this place: little time hath passed since we were almost in despair of having this place left to meet in. You see the dismal ruins the fire hath made: and nothing but a miracle of God's mercy could have preserved what is left from the same destruction."

When the presumptions of the city's being burnt by design came to be laid before a committee of the House of Commons, they were found of no weight; and the many stories, published at that time with great assurance, were declared void of credibility.

After all, it may perhaps be queried, whether the foregoing rumours and examinations, though incongruous with each other, may not afford some colour to a whisper, that the government itself was not without some ground of suspicion of having been the secret cause of the conflagration; to afford an opportunity of restoring the capital of the nation, in a manner more secure from future contagion, more generally wholesome for the inhabitants, more safe from fires, and more beautiful on the whole from the united effect of all these salutary purposes. Such however has been the result of that temporary disaster, whether accidental or not; and if intended, a more pardonable instance of doing evil that good may come of it, cannot perhaps be produced.

OF THE MONUMENT.

The Act of Parliament 19 and 20, Car. II. enacts, that, The better to preserve the memory of this dreadful visitation, a column or pillar of brass or stone be erected on, or as near unto the place where the fire unhappily began, as conveniently may be; in perpetual remembrance thereof: with such inscription thereon as the lord mayor and court of aldermen shall direct.

In obedience to which act, the fine piece of architecture called The Monument, was erected, at the expense of fourteen thousand five hundred pounds: it is the design of the great Sir Christopher Wren, and undoubtedly the finest modern column in the world, and in some respects may vie with the most famous of antiquity, being twenty-four feet higher than Trajan's pillar at Rome. It is of the Doric order, fluted; its altitude, two hundred and two feet from the ground; greatest diameter of the body fifteen feet; the ground bounded by the plinth or lower part of the pedestal, twenty-eight feet square; and the pedestal is in altitude forty feet; all of Portland stone. Within is a large staircase of black marble, containing three hundred forty-five steps, ten inches and a half broad, and six inches risers: a balcony within thirty-two feet from the top, whereon is a spacious and curious gilded flame, very suitable to the intent of the whole column.

On the front or west side of the die of the pedestal of this magnificent column is finely carved a curious emblem of this tragical scene, by the masterly hand of Mr. Gabriel Cibber. The eleven principal figures are in alto, the rest in basso relievo.

At the north end of the plain the city is represented in flames, and the inhabitants in consternation, their arms extended upward, crying for succour. A little nearer the horizon, the arms, cap of maintenance, and other ensigns of the city's grandeur, partly buried under the ruins. On the ruins lies the figure of a woman crowned with a castle, her breasts pregnant, and in her hand a sword; representing the strong, plentiful, and well-governed city of London in distress. The king is represented on a place ascended to by three steps, providing by his power and prudence for the comfort of his citizens and ornament of his city. On the steps stand three women: 1. Liberty, having in her right hand a hat wherein the word Liberty, denoting the freedom or liberty given these who engaged three years in the work. 2. Ichnographia, with rule and compasses in one hand, and a scroll in the other; near her the emblem of Industry, a bee-hive. 3. Imagination, holding the emblem of Invention. All which intimate, that the speedy re-erection of the city was principally owing to liberty, imagination, contrivance, art, and industry. There is the figure of Time raising the woman in distress, and Providence with a winged hand containing an eye, promising peace and plenty, by pointing to those two figures in the clouds. Behind the king the work is going forward. Under the king's feet appears Envy enraged at the prospect of success, and blowing flames out of his mouth. The figure of a lion with one fore-foot tied up, and the muzzle of a cannon, denote this deplorable misfortune to have happened in time of war: and Mars with a chaplet in his hand is an emblem of approaching peace. Round the cornice are noble enrichments of trophy work, the king's arms, sword, cap of maintenance, &c., at the angles, four very large dragons, the supporters of the city arms.

On this column of perpetual remembrance the lord

That on the north side describes the desolation of the city in ashes; and is thus translated:—

“In the year of Christ 1666, the second day of September, eastward from hence, at the distance of two hundred and two feet (the height of this column), about midnight a most terrible fire broke out, which, driven by a high wind, not only wasted the adjacent parts, but also places very remote, with incredible noise and fury; it consumed eighty-nine churches, the city gates, Guildhall, many public structures, hospitals, schools, libraries, a vast number of stately edifices, thirteen thousand two hundred dwelling-houses, four hundred streets; of twenty-six wards it entirely consumed fifteen, and left eight others shattered and half burnt; the ruins of the city were four hundred and thirty-six acres, from the Tower by the Thames side to the Temple church, and from the north-east gate of the city wall to Holborn bridge; to the estates and fortunes of the citizens it was merciless, but to their lives very favourable;* that it might in all things resemble the last conflagration of the world.”

The destruction was sudden, for in a small space of time, the same city was seen most flourishing, and reduced to nothing.

Three days after, when this fatal fire had baffled all human counsels and endeavours, in the opinions of all, as it were by the will of Heaven, it stopped, and on every side was extinguished.

The south side describes the glorious restoration of the city; and has been thus translated:—

* It was a very miraculous circumstance, amidst all this destruction and public confusion, no person was known either to be burnt, or trodden to death in the streets.

“Charles the second, son of Charles the martyr, king of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, a most gracious prince, commiserating the deplorable state of things, while the ruins were yet smoking, provided for the comfort of his citizens and the ornament of his city; remitted their taxes, and referred the petitions of the magistrates and inhabitants to the parliament, who immediately passed an act, that public buildings should be restored to greater beauty with public money, to be raised by an imposition on coals; that churches, and the cathedral of St. Paul’s, should be rebuilt from their foundations with all magnificence; that bridges, gates, and prisons should be made new; the sewers cleansed; the streets made strait and regular; such as were steep, levelled, and those too narrow, made wider; markets and shambles removed to separate places. They also enacted, that every house should be built with party walls, and all in front raised of equal height, and those walls all of square stone or brick; and that no man should delay beyond the space of seven years. Moreover, care was taken by law to prevent all suits about their bounds. Also, anniversary prayers were enjoined;* and to perpetuate the memory hereof to posterity, they caused this column to be erected. The work was carried on with diligence, and London is restored; but whether with greater speed or beauty may be made a question. Three years’ time saw that finished which was supposed to be the business of an age.”

* By stat. 19 and 20 Car. II. it is enacted, That the citizens of London, and their successors for the time to come, may retain the memory of so sad a desolation, and reflect seriously on the manifold iniquities, which are the unhappy causes of such judgments: Be it therefore enacted, That the second day of September (unless the same happen to be Sunday, and if so, then the next day following) be yearly for ever hereafter observed as a day of fasting and humiliation within the said city and liberties thereof, to implore the mercy of Almighty God upon the said city; to make devout prayers and supplications unto Him, to divert the like calamity for the time to come.

“This pillar was begun, Sir Richard Ford, knight, being lord mayor of London, in the year 1671 : carried on in the mayoralties of Sir George Waterman, knight ; Sir Robert Hanson, knight ; Sir William Hooker, knight ; Sir Robert Viner, knight ; Sir Joseph Sheldon, knight ; and finished, Sir Thomas Davis, knight, being lord Mayor, in the year 1677.”

The inscription on the plinth of the lower pedestal is in page 396.

On a stone in the front of the house built on the spot where the fire began, there was (very lately) the following inscription :—

“Here, by the permission of Heaven, hell broke loose on this Protestant city from the malicious hearts of barbarous Papists, by the hand of their agent Hubert, who confessed, and on the ruins of this place declared this fact, for which he was hanged, viz., That he here began the dreadful fire, which is described and perpetuated on and by the neighbouring pillar. Erected 1680, in the mayoralty of Sir Patience Ward, knight.”

THE EARL OF CLARENDON'S ACCOUNT OF THE GREAT FIRE.

It was upon the first day of that September, in the dismal year of 1666 (in which many prodigies were expected, and so many really fell out), that the memorable and terrible fire broke out in London, which began about midnight, or nearer the morning of Sunday, in a baker's house, at the end of Thames Street, next the Tower, there being many little narrow alleys, and very poor houses about the place where it first appeared; and then finding such store of combustible materials, as that street is always furnished with in timber houses, the fire prevailed so powerfully, that that whole street and the neighbourhood was in so short a time turned to ashes, that few persons had time to save and preserve any of their goods; but were a heap of people almost as dead with the sudden distraction, as the ruins were which they sustained. The magistrates of the city assembled quickly together, and with the usual remedies of buckets, which they were provided with: but the fire was too ravenous to be extinguished with such quantities of water as those instruments could apply to it, and fastened still upon new materials before it had destroyed the old. And though it raged furiously all that day, to that degree that all men stood amazed, as spectators only, no man knowing what remedy to apply, nor the magistrates what orders to give: yet it kept within some compass, burned what was next, and laid hold only on both sides; and the greatest apprehension was of the Tower, and all considerations entered upon how to secure that place.

But in the night the wind changed, and carried the danger from thence, but with so great and irresistible violence, that it scattered the fire from pursuing the line it was in with all its force, and spread it over the city; so that they, who went late to bed at a great distance from any place where the fire prevailed were awakened before morning with their own houses being in a flame; and whilst endeavour was used to quench that, other houses were discovered to be burning, which were near no place from whence they could imagine the fire could come; all which kindled another fire in the breasts of men, almost as dangerous as that within their houses.

Monday morning produced first a jealousy, and then an universal conclusion, that this fire came not by chance, nor did they care where it began; but the breaking out in several places at so great a distance from each other, made it evident that it was by conspiracy and combination. And this determination could not hold long without the discovery of the wicked authors, who were concluded to be all the Dutch and all the French in the town, though they had inhabited the same places above twenty years. All of that kind, or, if they were strangers, of what nation soever, were laid hold of; and after all the ill usage that can consist in words, and some blows and kicks, they were thrown into prison. And shortly after, the same conclusion comprehended all the Roman Catholics, who were in the same predicament of guilt and danger, and quickly found that their only safety consisted in keeping within doors; and yet some of them, and of quality, were taken by force out of their houses and carried to prison.

When this rage spread as far as the fire, and every hour brought reports of some bloody effects of it, worse than in truth there were, the king distributed many of the Privy Council into several quarters of the city, to prevent, by their authorities, those inhumanities which he heard were committed. In the meantime, even they, or any other person, thought it not safe to declare, "that they believed that the fire came by accident, or that it was not a plot of the Dutch and the French, and Papists, to burn the city;" which was so generally believed, and in the best company, that he who said the contrary was suspected for a conspirator, or at best a favourer of them. It could not be conceived how a house that was distant a mile from any part of the fire could suddenly be in a flame without some particular malice; and this case fell out every hour. When a man at the farthest end of Bread Street had made a shift to get out of his house his best and most portable goods, because the fire had approached near them, he no sooner had secured them, as he thought, in some friend's house in Holborn, which was believed a safe distance, but he saw that very house, and none else near it, in a sudden flame; nor did there want, in this woeful distemper, the testimony of witnesses who saw this villany committed, and apprehended men who they were ready to swear threw fire-balls into houses, which were presently burning.

The Lord Hollis and Lord Ashley, who had their quarters assigned about Newgate Market and the streets adjacent, had many brought to them in custody for crimes of this nature; and saw, within a very little distance from the place where they were, the people gathered together in great disorder; and as they came nearer saw a man in the middle of them without a hat or cloak, pulled and hauled, and very ill used, whom they knew to be a servant to the Portuguese ambassador, who was presently brought to them. And a substantial citizen was ready to take his oath, "that he saw that man put his hand into his pocket, and throw into a shop a fire-ball;" upon which he saw the house immediately on fire: whereupon, being on the other side of the way, "and seeing this, he cried out to the people to stop that gentleman, and made all the haste he could himself;" but the people had first seized upon him, and taken away his sword, which he was ready to draw; and he not speaking nor understanding English, they had used him in the manner set down before. The Lord Hollis told him what he was accused of, and "that he was seen to have thrown somewhat out of his pocket, which they thought to be a fire-ball, into a house which was now on fire; and the people had diligently searched his pockets to find more of the same commodity, but found nothing that they meant to accuse him of." The man standing in great amazement to hear he was so charged, the Lord Hollis asked him, "what it was he pulled out of his pocket, and what it was he threw into the house:" to which he answered, "that he did not think that he had put his hand into his pocket; but he remembered very well, that as he walked in the street he saw a piece of bread upon the ground, which he took up and laid upon a shelf in the next house; which is a custom or superstition so natural to the Portuguese, that if the king of Portugal were walking, and saw a piece of bread upon the ground, he would take it up with his own hand, and keep it till he saw a fit place to lay it down."

The house being in view, the Lords with many of the people walked to it, and found the piece of bread just within the door upon a board, where he said he laid it; and the house on fire was two doors beyond it, which the man who was on the other side of the way, and saw this man put his hand into the house without staying, and presently after the fire brake out, concluded to be the same house; which was very natural in the fright that all men were in: nor did the Lords, though they were satisfied, set the poor man at liberty; but, as if there remained ground enough of suspicion, committed him to the constable, to be kept by him in his own house for some hours, when they pretended they would examine him again. Nor were any persons who were seized upon in the same manner, as multitudes were in all parts of the town, especially if they were strangers or Papists, presently discharged, when there was no reasonable ground to suspect; but all sent to prison, where they were in much more security than they could have been in full liberty, after they were once known to have been suspected; and most of them understood their commitment to be upon that ground, and were glad of it.

The fire and the wind continued in the same excess all Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, till afternoon, and flung and scattered brands burning into all quarters; the nights more terrible than the days, and the light the same, the light of the fire supplying that of the sun. And indeed whoever was an eye-witness of that terrible prospect, can never have so lively an image of the last conflagration till he beholds it; the faces of all people in a wonderful dejection and discomposure, not knowing where they could repose themselves for one hour's sleep, and no distance thought secure from the fire, which suddenly started up, before it was suspected; so that people left their houses, and carried away their goods from many places which received no hurt, and whither they afterwards returned again; all the fields full of women and children, who had made a shift to bring thither some goods and conveniences to rest upon, as safer than any houses, where yet they felt such intolerable heat and drought, as if they had been in the middle of the fire. The King and the Duke, who rode from one place to another, and put themselves into great dangers amongst the burning and falling houses, to give advice and direction what was to be done, underwent as much fatigue as the meanest, and had as little sleep or rest; and the faces of all men appeared ghastly, and in the highest confusion. The country sent in carts to help those miserable people who had saved any goods: and by this means, and the help of coaches, all the neighbour villages were filled with more people than they could contain, and more goods than they could find room for; so that those fields became likewise as full as the other about London and Westminster.

It was observed, that where the fire prevailed most, when it met with brick buildings, if it was not repulsed, it was so well resisted that it made a much slower progress; and when it had done its worst, that the timber and all the combustible matter fell, it fell down to the bottom within the house, and the walls stood and enclosed the fire, and it was burned out without making a farther progress in many of those places: and then the vacancy so interrupted the fury of it, that many times the two or three next houses stood without much damage. Besides the spreading, insomuch as all London seemed but one fire in the breadth of it, it seemed to continue in its full fury a direct line to the Thames side, all Cheapside from beyond the Exchange, through Fleet Street; insomuch as for that breadth, taking in both sides as far as the Thames, there was scarce a house or church standing from the bridge to Dorset House, which was burned on Tuesday night after Baynard's Castle.

On Wednesday morning, when the King saw that neither the fire decreased nor the wind lessened, he even despaired of preserving Whitehall, but was more afraid of Westminster Abbey. But having observed by his having visited all places, that where there was any vacant place between the houses, there the progress of the fire was much less, changed its course and went to the water-side, he gave order for pulling down many houses about Whitehall, some whereof were newly built and hardly finished, and sent many of his choice goods by water to Hampton Court; as most of the persons of quality in the Strand, who had the benefit of the river, got barges and other vessels, and sent their furniture for their houses to some houses some miles out of the town. And very many on both sides the Strand, who knew not whither to go, and scarce what they did, fled with their families out of their houses into the streets, that they might not be within when the fire fell upon their houses.

But it pleased God, contrary to all expectation, that on Wednesday, about four or five of the clock in the afternoon, the wind fell; and as in an instant the fire decreased, having burned all on the Thames side to the new buildings of the Inner Temple, next to Whitefriars, and having consumed them, was stopped by that vacancy from proceeding farther into that house, but laid hold on some old buildings which joined to Ram Alley, and swept all those into Fleet Street. And the other side being likewise destroyed to Fetter Lane, it advanced no farther; but left the other part of Fleet Street to the Temple Bar, and all the Strand, unhurt, but what the damage the owners of the houses had done to themselves by endeavouring to remove; and it ceased in all other parts of the town near the same time.

The greatest care then (when the fire had ceased in all parts) was, to keep good guards to watch the fire that was upon the ground, that it might not break out again, And this was the better performed, because they who had yet their houses standing had not the courage to sleep, but watched with much less distraction; though the same distemper still remained in the utmost extent, "that all this had fallen out by the conspiracy of the French and Dutch with the Papists;" and all gaols were filled with those who were every hour apprehended upon that jealousy; or rather upon some evidence that they were guilty of the crime. And the people were so sottish, that they believed that all the French in the town (which no doubt were a very great number) were drawn into a body, to prosecute those by the sword who were preserved from the fire; and the inhabitants of a whole street have ran in a great tumult one way, upon the rumour that the French were marching at the other end of it; so terrified men were with their own apprehensions.

When the night, though far from being a quiet one, had somewhat lessened the consternation, the first care the King took was, that the country might speedily supply markets in all places, that they who had saved themselves from burning might not be in danger of starving; and if there had not been extraordinary care and diligence used, many would have perished that way. The vast destruction of corn, and all other sorts of provisions, in those parts where the fire had prevailed, had not only left all that people destitute of all that was to be eat or drank; but the bakers and brewers who inhabited the other parts which were unhurt, had forsaken their houses, and carried away all that was portable; insomuch that many days passed before they were enough in their wits and in their houses to fall to their occupations; and those parts of the town which God had spared and preserved were many hours without anything to eat, as well as they who were in the fields. And yet it can hardly be conceived, how great a supply of all kinds was brought from all places within four-and-twenty hours. And which was more miraculous, in four days, in all the fields about the town; which had seemed covered with those whose habitations were burned, and with the goods which they had saved, there was scarce a man to be seen: all found shelter in so short a time, either in those parts which remained of the city and in the suburbs, or in the neighbour villages; all kinds of people expressing a marvellous charity towards those who appeared to be undone. And very many, with more expedition than can be conceived, set up little sheds of brick and timber upon the ruins of their own houses, where they chose rather to inhabit than in more convenient places, though they knew they could not long reside in those new buildings.

The King was not more troubled at any particular than at the imagination which possessed the hearts of so many, that all this mischief had fallen out by a real and formed conspiracy; which, albeit he saw no colour to believe, he found very many intelligent men, and even some of his own council, who did really believe it. Whereupon he appointed the Privy Council to sit both morning and evening, to examine all evidence of that kind that should be brought before them, and to send for any persons who had been committed to prison upon some evidence that made the greatest noise; and sent for the Lord Chief Justice, who was in the country, to come to the town for the better examination of all suggestions and allegations of that kind, there having been some malicious report scattered about the town, "that the court had so great a prejudice against any kind of testimony of such a conspiracy, that they discountenanced all witnesses who came before them to testify what they knew;" which was without any colour of truth. Yet many, who were produced as if their testimony would remove all doubts, made such senseless relations of what they had been told, without knowing the condition of the persons who told them, or where to find them, that it was a hard matter to forbear smiling at their evidence. Some Frenchmen's houses had been searched, in which had been found many of those shells for squibs and other fireworks, frequently used in nights of joy and triumph; and the men were well known, and had lived many years there by that trade, and had no other: and one of these was the King's servant, and employed by the Office of Ordnance for making grenades of all kinds, as well for the hand as for mortar-pieces. Yet these men were looked upon as in the number of the conspirators, and remained still in prison till their neighbours solicited for their liberty. And it cannot be enough wondered at, that in this general rage of the people no mischief was done to the strangers, that no one of them was assassinated outright, though many were sorely beaten and bruised.

There was a very odd accident that confirmed many in what they were inclined to believe, and startled others, who thought the conspiracy impossible, since no combination not very discernible and discovered could have effected that mischief, in which the immediate hand of God was so visible. Amongst many Frenchmen who had been sent to Newgate, there was one Hubert, a young man of five or six and twenty years of age, the son of a famous watchmaker in the city of Rouen; and this fellow had wrought in the same profession with several men in London, and had for many years, both in Rouen and London, been looked upon as distracted. This man confessed "that he had set the first house on fire, and that he had been hired in Paris a year before to do it: that there were three more combined with him to do the same thing, and that they came over together into England to put it in execution in the time of the plague; but when they were in London, he and two of his companions went into Sweden, and returned from thence in the latter end of August, and he resolved to undertake it; and that the two others went away into France."

The whole examination was so senseless, that the Chief Justice, who was not looked upon as a man who wanted rigour, did not believe any thing he said. He was asked, "who it was in Paris that suborned him to this action?" to which he answered, "that he did not know, having never seen him before;" and in the enlarging upon that point he contradicted himself in many particulars. Being asked "what money he had received to perform a service of so much hazard," he said, "he had received but a pistole, but was promised five pistoles more when he should have done his work;" and many such unreasonable things, that nobody present credited any thing he said. However, they durst not slight the evidence, but put him to a particular, in which he so fully confirmed all that he had said before, that they were surprised with wonder, and knew not afterwards what to say or think. They asked him, "if he knew the place where he first put fire;" he answered, "that he knew it very well, and would show it to any body." Upon this the Chief Justice, and many Aldermen who sate with him, sent a guard of substantial citizens with the prisoner, that he might show them the house; and they first led him to a place at some distance from it, and asked him "if that were it;" to which he answered presently, "no, it was lower, nearer to the Thames." The house and all which were near it were so covered and buried in ruins, that the owners themselves, without some infallible mark, could very hardly have said where their own houses had stood: but this man led them directly to the place, described how it stood, the shape of the little yard, the fashion of the door and windows, and where he first put the fire; and all this with such exactness, that they who had dwelt long near it could not so perfectly have described all particulars.

This silenced all farther doubts. And though the Chief Justice told the King, "that all his discourse was so disjointed that he did not believe him guilty; nor was there one man who prosecuted or accused him: yet upon his own confession, and so sensible a relation of all that he had done, accompanied with so many circumstances (though without the least show of compunction or sorrow for what he said he had done, nor yet seeming to justify or to take delight in it; but being asked whether he was not sorry for the wickedness, and whether he intended to do so much, he gave no answer at all, or made reply to what was said; and with the same temper died,) the Jury found him guilty, and he was executed accordingly. And though no man could imagine any reason why a man should so desperately throw away his life, which he might have saved though he had been guilty, since he was only accused upon his own confession ; yet neither the Judges nor any present at the trial did believe him guilty, but that he was a poor distracted wretch weary of his life, and chose to part with it this way. Certain it is, that upon the strictest examination that could be afterwards made by the King's command, and then by the diligence of the House, that upon the jealousy and rumour made a committee, that was very diligent and solicitous to make that discovery, there was never any probable evidence (that poor creature's only excepted) that there was any other cause of that woeful fire, than the displeasure of God Almighty : the first accident of the beginning in a baker's house, where there was so great a stock of faggots, and the neighbourhood of much combustible matter, of pitch and rosin and the like, led it in an instant from house to house through Thames Street, with the agitation of so terrible a wind to scatter and disperse it.

Let the cause be what it would, the effect was very terrible ; for above two parts of three of that great city were burned to ashes, and those the most rich and wealthy parts of the city, where the greatest warehouses and best shops stood. The Royal Exchange with all the streets about it, Lombard Street, Cheapside, Paternoster Row, St. Paul's Church, and almost all the other churches in the city, with the Old Bailey, Ludgate, all Paul's Church-yard, even to the Thames, and the greatest part of Fleet Street, all which were places the best inhabited, were all burned without one house remaining.

The value or estimate of what that devouring fire consumed, over and above the houses, could never be computed in any degree : for, besides that the first night (which in a moment swept away the vast wealth of Thames Street) there was not anything that could be preserved in respect of the suddenness and amazement (all people being in their beds till the fire was in their houses, and so could save nothing but themselves), the next day with the violence of the wind increased their distraction; nor did many believe that the fire was near them, or that they had reason to remove their goods, till it was upon them, and rendered it impossible. Then it fell out at a season in the year, the beginning of September, when very many of the substantial citizens and other wealthy men were in the country, whereof many had not left a servant in their houses, thinking themselves upon all ordinary accidents more secure in the goodness and kindness of their neighbours, than they could be in the fidelity of a servant; and whatsoever was in such houses was entirely consumed by the fire, or lost as to the owners. And of this class of absent men, when the fire came where the lawyers had houses, as they had in many places, especially Serjeant's Inn in Fleet Street, with that part of the Inner Temple that was next it and Whitefriars, there was scarce a man to whom those lodgings appertained who was in town: so that whatsoever was there, their money, books, and papers, besides the evidences of many men's estates deposited in their hands, were all burned or lost, to a very great value. But of particular men's losses could never be made any computation.

It was an incredible damage that was and might rationally be computed to be sustained by one small company, the company of Stationers, in books, paper, and the other lesser commodities which are vendible in that corporation, which amounted to no less than two hundred thousand pounds; in which prodigious loss there was one circumstance very lamentable: all those who dwelt near St. Paul's carried their goods, books, paper, and the like, as others of greater trades did their commodities, into the large vaults which were under St. Paul's Church, before the fire came thither; which vaults, though all the church above the ground was afterwards burned, with all the houses round about, still stood firm and supported the foundation, and preserved all that was within them; until the impatience of those who had lost their houses, and whatsoever they had else, in the fire, made them very desirous to see what they had saved, upon which all their hopes were founded to repair the rest.

It was the fourth day after the fire ceased to flame, though it still burned in the ruins, from whence there was still an intolerable heat, when the booksellers especially, and some other tradesmen, who had deposited all they had preserved in the greatest and most spacious vault, came to behold all their wealth, which to that moment was safe: but the doors were no sooner opened, and the air from without fanned the strong heat within, but first the dryest and most combustible matters broke into a flame, which consumed all, of what kind soever, that till then had been unhurt there. Yet they who had committed their goods to some lesser vaults, at a distance from that greater, had better fortune; and having learned from the second ruin of their friends to have more patience, attended till the rain fell, and extinguished the fire in all places, and cooled the air; and then they securely opened the doors, and received all from thence that they had there.

If so vast a damage as two hundred thousand pounds befel that little company of Stationers in books and paper and the like, what shall we conceive was lost in cloth (of which the country clothiers lost all that they had brought up to Blackwell Hall against Michaelmas, which was all burned with that fair structure), in silks of all kinds, in linen, and those richer manufactures? Not to speak of money, plate, and jewels, whereof some were recovered out of the ruins of those houses which the owners took care to watch, as containing somewhat that was worth the looking for, and in which deluge there were men ready enough to fish.

The Lord Mayor (Sir Thomas Bludworth), though a very honest man, was much blamed for want of sagacity in the first night of the fire, before the wind gave it much advancement: for, though he came with great diligence as soon as he had notice of it, and was present with the first, yet having never been used to such spectacles, his consternation was equal to that of other men, nor did he know how to apply his authority to the remedying the present distress; and when men who were less terrified with the object pressed him very earnestly, "that he would give order for the present pulling down those houses which were nearest, and by which the fire climbed to go farther" (the doing whereof, at that time, might probably have prevented much of the mischief that succeeded), he thought it not safe counsel, and made no other answer, than "that he durst not do it without the consent of the owners." His want of skill was the less wondered at, when it was known afterwards, that some gentlemen of the Inner Temple would not endeavour to preserve the goods which were in the lodgings of absent persons, nor suffer others to do it, "because," they said, "it was against the law to break up any man's chamber."

The so sudden repair of those formidable ruins, and the giving so great beauty to all deformity (a beauty and a lustre that city had never before been acquainted with), is little less wonderful than the fire which consumed it.
